

3 1761 03989 0363

UNIV. OF TORONTO
LIBRARY

ITALIAN COURTESY-BOOKS.

---

FRA BONVICINO DA RIVA'S

Fifty Courtesies for the Table

(ITALIAN AND ENGLISH)

WITH OTHER

TRANSLATIONS AND ELUCIDATIONS

BY

WILLIAM MICHAEL ROSSETTI.

356911
10.11.38.

3

TO THE ENGLISH PAINTER
WHO HAS MADE CIVILIZED MANKIND HIS DEBTOR
BY RECOVERING THE PORTRAIT OF

Dante BY Giotto,

THE TWO DII MAJORES OF ITALIAN MEDIEVALISM,

TO THE

BARONE KIRKUP,

MY FATHER'S HONOURED FRIEND AND MY OWN,

I AM PERMITTED TO DEDICATE

THIS SLIGHT ATTEMPT IN A BRANCH OF ITALIAN STUDY

LONG FAMILIAR TO HIMSELF.

W. M. R.

June 1869.

CONTENTS.

---

	PAGE
ITALY AND COURTESY ... ..	7
BRUNETTO LATINI ... ..	8
THE TESORETTO :—EXTRACT ... ..	10
FRA BONVICINO DA RIVA ... ..	14
THE ZINQUANTA CORTEXIE DA TAVOLA—ITALIAN AND ENGLISH	16
SUMMARY OF THE CORTEXIE ... ..	32
FRANCESCO DA BARBERINO ... ..	35
THE DOCUMENTI D'AMORE :—EXTRACT ... ..	38
THE REGGIMENTO E COSTUMI DELLE DONNE :—EXTRACT ...	45
SANDRO DI PIPPOZZO, GRAZIOLO DE' BOMBAGLIOLI, AND UGOLINO BRUCOLA ... ..	56
AGNOLO PANDOLFINI ... ..	57
THE GOVERNO DELLA FAMIGLIA :—EXTRACT ... ..	57
MATTEO PALMIERI ... ..	58
THE VITA CIVILE :—EXTRACT ... ..	58
BALDASSAR CASTIGLIONE ... ..	60
THE CORTIGIANO :—EXTRACT ... ..	61
GIOVANNI BATTISTA POSSEVINI ... ..	65
THE DIALOGO DELL' ONORE :—EXTRACT ... ..	66
MONSIGNOR GIOVANNI DELLA CASA ... ..	66
THE GALATEO :—EXTRACT ... ..	68
THE TRATTATO DEGLI UFFICI COMUNI :—EXTRACT ...	74

Amalgam

IN connection with the many samples of English and some French and Latin Courtesy-Books which the pains of other Editors have set before the members of the Early English Text Society, I have been asked to do something to exhibit what Italian literature has to show for itself in the same line. The request is one which I gladly close with ; only cautioning the reader at starting that he must not expect to find in my brief essay any deep or exhaustive knowledge of the subject, or anything beyond specimens of the works under consideration, picked out one here and one there. Italy, it is tolerably well known, was, together with Provence, in the forefront of civilization—or ‘civility,’ as it might here be more aptly phrased—in the middle ages ; and I should not be surprised to learn that, in the refinements of life and niceties of method, the Italy of the thirteenth century, as traceable in her Courtesy-Books, was quite on a par with the France or Germany<sup>1</sup> of the fourteenth, or the England of the fifteenth, and so progressively on. This, however, is a matter which I must leave to be determined by more diligent and more learned researches than my own. The materials for the comparison are now, to some extent, fairly before the editing and reading members of our Society.

As regards date, at all events, Italy is greatly in advance. What is the date of the earliest French Courtesy-Book included in our series? Not far, I presume, from the close of the fourteenth century. What of the earliest English one? About 1450. Against these we can set an Italian Courtesy-Book—or rather a Courtesy section of an Italian book—dating about 1265. Of a date prior to this (the birth-year of Dante), there is little of either prose or poetry in Italian.

<sup>1</sup> As mentioned below, the first German work including something by way of Courtesy-Book, ab. 1210 A.D., Der Wälsche Gast, was written by an Italian, Tomasin von Zirclaria.

The author of our specimen is a man illustrious in the literature of Italy, though comparatively little read for some centuries past—Brunetto Latini; remembered chiefly among miscellaneous readers as the preceptor of Dante, and as consigned by that affectionate but unaccommodating pupil to a very ugly circle of his Hell. There, if we may believe the ‘Poet of Rectitude,’ Ser Brunetto, with a ‘baked aspect,’ is at this moment unremittingly walking under an unremitting rain of fire: were he to pause, he would remain moveless for a century, and the torture of the flames would persecute him in aggravated proportion. On the same authority (which it is futile to fence with), I am compelled to say that Brunetto is the last person from whom one need wish to learn the practice, or as a consequence the theory, of modern or European morals.

However, Brunetto seems to have considered that he had a gift that way. Both his leading works may be termed moral-scientific treatises. The longer of the two, the Tesoro, was written in French prose, and is much of a compilation from classic authors in some sections. It had hitherto only been preserved to the public in an old Italian translation, but quite recently the French text has been printed. Sacred, profane, and natural history, geography, oratory, politics, and morals, are the main subject-matter of this encyclopædic labour; than which probably no contemporary produced anything more widely learned, according to the standard of that age. The Tesoretto is a shorter performance, written in Italian verse; shorter, yet still of substantial length, numbering, even in its extant incomplete state, 22 sections or ‘capitoli.’ This is the work upon which I shall draw for our first specimen of an Italian Courtesy-Book. Something bearing upon the like questions might also be gleaned from the Tesoro, but, as that is properly a French book, I leave it aside.

The Tesoretto sets forth that its author, being at Roncesvalles on his return from an embassy in Spain, received the bad news of the battle of Montaperti. Getting astray in a forest,<sup>1</sup> he finds himself in the presence of no less a personage than Dame Nature, who proceeds to give him practical and theoretic demonstrations on all sorts of lofty subjects. She then tells him to explore the forest, where he would find Philosophy, the four Moral Virtues (Prudence, Temperance, Fortitude, and Justice), Love, Fortune, and Over-reaching (Baratteria). He follows her instructions, searching out these personages from Philosophy on to Love: the four Virtues are attended by many ladies, among whom Brunetto specifies particularly Liberality, Courtesy, Good-faith, and Valour. After his interview with Love, he resolves to reconcile himself with God, and makes a full confession at Montepérier. Having received absolution, he does not return after Fortune and Over-reaching, but goes back to the forest, and thence reaches the summit of Mount Olympus. Here he sees Ptolemy, who is about to harangue him, when suddenly the Tesoretto comes to an end. Its best editor, the Abate Zannoni, supposes that the concluding portion of the poem was written, but has been lost to posterity.

A few words must be added as to the incidents of the author's life. He was born (probably) not much later than 1220 in the Florentine state, and died in 1294. After the great defeat of the Guelphs by the Ghibellines at Montaperti in 1260, Brunetto, with others of the Guelph party, which was almost uninterruptedly uppermost in Florence, found it expedient to emigrate from that capital. He went to Paris, and there wrote both the Tesoro and Tesoretto. Towards 1265 he was again re-established in his native country, exercising with great credit his profession of a notary, and also (by or before the year 1273) holding the post of secretary to the Commune of Florence. He became, as already mentioned, the preceptor of Dante. As the pupil has damned him to all time at any rate, if not in effect to all eternity, for one offence, let us at least preserve some memory of his countervailing merits, as set forth by Giovanni and Filippo Villani. The former affirms that Brunetto 'was the initiator and master in refining the Florentines, and cultivating their use of language ; and in regulating the justice and rule of our Republic according to policy.' And, according to Filippo, ' Brunetto Latini was by profession a philosopher, by occupation a notary, and of great name and celebrity. He showed forth how much of rhetoric he could add to the gifts of nature : a man, if it be permitted to say so, worthy of being reckoned along with those skilled and ancient orators. He was facetious, learned, and acute, and abounded in certain pleasantries of speech ; yet not without gravity, and the reserve of modesty, which bespoke a most cordial acceptance for his humour : of agreeable discourse, which often moved to laughter. He was obliging and decorous, and by nature serviceable, reserved, and grave ; and most happy in the habit of all virtues, had he been wisely able to endure with a more steadfast mind the outrages of his infuriated country.'

<sup>1</sup> Possibly this notion prompted Dante to represent himself, in the opening of the Commedia, as also lost in a forest.

The Tesoretto is of course a mine of curiosities of various kinds, tempting to the literary explorer. To call it distinctly a fine poem, or even the performance of a strictly poetic mind, might be the exaggeration of an enthusiast ; but at all events it contains much sound matter well put, and by no means destitute of entertainment. The section that falls in best with our present purpose is the speech assigned to Lady Courtesy : I present it in its entirety.

' Be sure that Liberality is the head and greatness<sup>1</sup>
 Of my mystery ; so that I am little worth,
 And, if she aids me not, I should find scant acceptance.
 She is my foundation ; and I am her gilding,
 And colour, and varnish. But, to say the very truth,
 If we have two names, we are well-nigh one thing.

But to thee, gentle friend, I say first
 That in thy speech thou be circumspect.
 Be not too great a talker, and think aforehand
 What thou wouldst be saying ; for never <sup>1</sup> The line here translated as one forms two in the Italian, and the like with our sequel ; Brunetto's metre being an ungracefully short one—thus :

'Sic certo che Larghezza
 È'l capo e la grandezza,' &c.

Indeed the metre keeps up such a perpetual jingling as almost to reduce to doggerel what might, in a different rhythmical form, be accepted as very fair rhyme and reason indeed. I have thrown the several couplets into single lines, in the translation, simply with a view to saving space.

Doth the word that is spoken return,—like the arrow
 Which goes and returns not. He who has a goodly tongue,
 Little sense suffices him, if by folly he spoils it not.
 Be thy speech gentle; and see it be not harsh
 In any position of command, for thou canst not Give people any graver annoy. I advise that he should die
 Who displeases by harshness, for he never conquers the habit:
 And he who has no moderation, if he acts well, he filches that.
 Be not exasperating; neither be a tell-tale
 Of what another person has spoken in thy presence;
 Nor yet use contumely; nor tell any one a lie,
 Nor slander of any,—for in sooth there is no one
 Of whom one might not say something offensive offhand.
 Neither be so self-sufficient as that even one hard word
 Affecting another person should issue from thy mouth;
 For too much self-sufficiency is contrary to good usage.
 And let him who is on the highway beware of speaking folly.

But thou knowest that I command thee, and put it as a strict precept,
 That thou honour to the utmost thy good friend
 On foot and on horseback: and be sure that for a small fault
 Thou bear no grudge—let not love fail on thy part.
 And have it always in mind to associate with people of honour,
 And from others hold aloof; so that (as with the crafts<sup>1</sup>)
 Thou mayst not acquire any vice, whereof, before thou couldst amend it,
 Thou shalt have scathe and shame. Therefore at all hours
 Hold fast to good usage; for that advances thee
 In credit and honour, and makes thee better,
 And gives fair seeming,—for a good nature
 Becomes the clearer and more polished if it follows good habits.
 But see none the less that, if thou shouldst appear tedious
 To such or such a company, thou venture to frequent it no more,
 But procure thyself some other to which thy ways are pleasing.
 Friend, heed this well: with one richer than thyself
 Seek not to associate,—for thou shalt be as their merry-maker,
 Or else thou wilt spend as much as they; for, if thou didst not this,
 Thou wouldst be mean,—and reflect always
 That a costly beginning demands perseverance.
 Therefore thou must provide, if thy means allow it,

<sup>1</sup> The original runs

‘Che, siccome dell’ arti,
 Qualche vizio non prendi.’

This phrase is not quite clear to me; but I suppose the word ‘arti’ is to be understood as meaning ‘crafts, trades, or professions,’ and that Brunetto had been sharp enough to see that people become ‘shoppy’ according to their respective shops. ‘Vous êtes orfèvre, Monsieur Josse.’

That thou do this openly. If not, then mind
 Not to make such expenditure as shall afterwards be reproved ;
 But adopt such a system as to be consistent with thyself.
 And, if thou art a little better off [than thy comrades], do not get away,

But spend on the same scale ; take no advantage :—
 And at all times take heed, if there is in thy company
 A man, in thine opinion, of inferior means,
 That, for God's sake, thou force him not into more than he can meet ;
 For, if, for thy convenience, he spends his money amiss,
 And comes to poverty, thou wilt be blamed therefor.

And in sooth there are persons of high condition
 Who call themselves " noble " : all others they hold cheap
 Because of this nobility. And, in that conceit,
 They will call a man " tradesman " <sup>1</sup> who would sooner spend a bushel
 Of florins than they of halfpence, <sup>2</sup>—

Although the means of both might be of like amount.
 And he who holds himself noble, without doing any other good
 Save of the name, fancies he is making the cross to himself,
 But he does make the fig to himself. <sup>3</sup> He who endures not toil
 For honour's sake, let him not imagine that he comes
 Among men of worth, because he is of lofty race ;
 For I hold him noble who shows that he follows the path
 Of great valour and of gentle nurture,—
 So that, besides his lineage, he does deeds of worth,
 And lives honourably so as to make himself beloved.
 I admit indeed that, if the one and other are equal in good deeds,

<sup>1</sup> ' Mercennaiio '—literally, mercenary or hireling.

<sup>2</sup> ' Picciolini.' These were, I gather, coins of a particular denomination, but I have not been able to ascertain their precise value.

<sup>3</sup> ' *Crede si far la croce,
 Ma e' si fa la fica.*'

I have translated literally ; but that of course makes something very like nonsense in English. To ' make the fig ' is a gesture of the thumb and fingers, understood as gross and insulting in the highest degree. The general sense of the passage is therefore—' He fancies he is thus testifying in his own honour, whereas it really does redound to his own extreme shame.' Readers of Dante, remembering the splendid canzone

' Le dolci rime d'amor ch' io solia,'

in which he refutes the false and defines the true bases of ' nobility ' (gentilezza), will perceive that the illustrious pupil had been to a great extent anticipated by the teaching of his early instructor. Francesco da Barberino (Reggimento e Costumi delle Donne) adopts a middle course, discriminating ' gentilezza ' thus : ' Nobility is twofold in quality and in origin. The first is a state of the human soul contented in virtue, hostile to vice, exulting in the good of others, and pitiful in their adversity. The second is mastery over men or riches, derived from of old, sensitive to shame when brought low.'

He who is the better born is esteemed the higher :
 Not through any teaching of mine, but it seems to be the usage,
 Which conquers and overthrows many of my ways,
 So that I can no otherwise ; for this world is so dense
 That the right is even judged of according to a little talking,
 For the great and the lesser live therein by rumour.

Therefore be heedful to keep among them so silent
 That they may have nothing to laugh at. Adopt their modes,
 For I rather advise thee to follow their wrongfulness.<sup>1</sup>
 For, though thou shouldst be in the right, yet, as soon as it pleases not them,

It avails thee nothing to speak well, nor yet ill.
 Therefore recount no tale, unless it appears good and fair
 To all who hear it ; for somebody will censure thee for it,
 And add lies thereto when thou art gone,
 Which must assuredly grieve thee. So thou must know,
 In such company, to play the prudent part,
 And be heedful to say what will please.
 And as for the good, if thou knowest it, thou wilt tell it to others
 Where thou art known and held dear ;
 For thou wilt find among people many fools
 Who take greater pleasure in hearing something scurrilous
 Than what is profitable. Pass on, and heed not,
 And be circumspect.

If a man of great repute
 Should at any time do something that is out of bounds
 In street or church, follow not the example :
 For he has no excuse who conforms to the wrong-doing of others.
 And see that thou err not if thou art staying or going
 With a lady or lord, or other superior,—
 Also that, although he be but thine equal, thou observe to honour him,
 Each according to his condition. Be so heedful of this,
 Both of less and more, that thou lose not self-restraint.
 To thine inferior, however, render not more honour
 Than beseems him, nor such that he should hold thee cheap for it :
 And so, if he is the inferior, always walk a step in advance.
 And, if thou art on horseback, avoid every fault ;
 And, if thou goest through the city, I counsel thee to go
 Very courteously. Ride decorously,
 With head a little bowed, for to go in that loose-reined way

<sup>1</sup> Here, on the contrary, we come to a precept the reverse of Dantesque. Yet, on combining this passage with that which opens the ensuing paragraph, it would seem that Brunetto does not mean to recommend connivance with anything that is positively evil, but only with current habits and fashions, objectionable though they may be, in matters essentially indifferent—as of speech and deportment.

Looks most boorish ; and stare not up at the height
 Of every house thou comest to. Mind that thou move not about
 Like a man from the country—wriggle not like an eel :
 But go steadily along the road and among the people.

When thou art asked for a loan, delay not.
 If thou art willing to lend, make not the man linger so long
 That the favour shall be lost before it is rendered.

And, when thou art in company, always follow
 Their modes and their liking ; for thou must not want
 To be just suiting thine own taste, nor to be at odds with them.

And always be heedful that thou give not any gross glances
 At any woman living, in house or street ;
 For he who does thus, and calls himself a lover,
 Is esteemed a blackguard.<sup>1</sup> And I have seen before now
 A man lose position by a single act of levity ;<sup>2</sup>
 For in this country such goings-on are not admired.
 And take heed in every case that Love, with his arts,
 In flame not thy heart. With severest pain
 Wouldst thou consume thy life ; nor couldst thou be numbered
 In my following, wert thou in his power.<sup>3</sup>

Now return in-doors, for it is the time ;
 And be liberal and courteous, so that in every country
 All thy belongings be deemed pleasurable.'

We now pass from Florence to Lombardy—from Ser Brunetto Latini to Fra Bonvicino da Riva—from the lawyer and official to the friar and professor. The poem of Fra Bonvicino, The Fifty Courtesies for the Table, will be our principal pièce de résistance, and presented accordingly in its own garnishing of old Italian as well as in English. Not that it is by any means the best or most important piece of work that we have to bring forward ; but its rarity, its dialectic interest for students of old Italian, and its precision and detail with regard to one of the essentials of courtesy—the art of dining—

<sup>1</sup> 'Briccon'—the colloquial term still in daily use among Italians.

<sup>2</sup> 'Solo d'una canzone.' literally, 'merely for one song.' The Abate Zannoni understands this to mean 'per aver una sola volta canzonato femmina.' He admits that this sense of the phrase is not discoverable in that fetish of the Italian pedant, the Dizionario della Crusca ; but as I have no superior authority to oppose to that of Abate Zannoni, I have followed his interpretation.

<sup>3</sup> This seems strange doctrine—that love of courtesy and love of women cannot co-exist in the same man—if we are to accept it in its amplest sense. Perhaps, however, we are to understand that the speaker is still confining his censures to miscellaneous and unsanctioned amours or flirtations, especially with married women.

give it exceptional value for our direct purpose. The poem is supposed to have been written about 1290.

Unpolished as he is in poetic development, Fra Bonvicino is not to be altogether slighted from a literary point of view. Tiraboschi (Storia della Letteratura Italiana) believes that Bonvicino and one other were the two sole verse-writers of the Lombard or Milanese State in this opening period of Italian poesy; and Signor Biondelli, whom we have to thank for the publication of Bonvicino's production after so many centuries of its hybernation in MS, can point to the choiceness of the old Friar's vocabulary. In one couplet that well-qualified editor is able to find five expressions 'which, for propriety and purity, would even at the present day beseem the most careful of writers;' and hence he pronounces Bonvicino 'the elegant writer of his time.' It should be understood, however, that the MS reproduced by Signor Biondelli, and now again in the present volume, gives but an inadequate idea of the primitiveness of Bonvicino's own actual idiom. Tiraboschi cites a harsher version of the first stanza from an earlier MS then existing in the Library of Santa Maria Inconoronata in Milan, but which is now undiscoverable: the MS used by Signor Biondelli is of a much later date, the fifteenth century. It pertains to the Ambrosian Library in Milan.

Bonvicino belonged to the third order of the Friars named Umiati, and lived (as he himself informs us) in Legnano, a town of the Milanese district. Hence he went to Milan, and became a distinguished professor of grammar in the Palatine schools. The only other poem of his published in Signor Biondelli's volume<sup>1</sup> is On the dignity of the Glorious Virgin Mary: but Tiraboschi specifies other productions in verse—Dialogues in praise of Almsgiving, between the Virgin and Satan, between the Virgin and the Sinner, between the Creator and the Soul, between the Soul and the Body, between the Violet and the Rose, between the Fly and the Ant; also the Legends of Job and of St Alexius; and various works in Latin, of which some have been published.

<sup>1</sup> Poesie Lombarde Inedite del Secolo 13, pubblicate ed illustrate da B. Biondelli. Milano: Bernardoni. 1856. We are indebted to Signor Biondelli's courtesy for a copy of this curious and interesting work.

DE LE

ZINQUANTA CORTEXIE DA TAVOLA

DE FRA BONVEXINO DA RIVA

- Fra bon Vexino da Riva, che stete in borgo Legniano
 De le cortexie da descho ne dixè primano ;
 De le cortexie cinquanta che se den servare a descho
 Fra bon Vexino da Riva ne parla mo' de frescho. 4
- La primiera è questa : che quando tu è a mensa,
 Del povero bexognoxo imprimamente inpensa ;
 Che quando tu pasci lo povero, tu pasci lo tó Signore,
 Che te passerà, poxe la toa morte, in lo eternal dolzore. 8
- La cortexia segonda : se tu sporze aqua alle man,
 Adornamente la sporze ; guarda no sia vilan ;
 Asay ghe ne sporze, no tropo, quando el è tempo d'estae ;
 D' inverno per lo fregio in pizina quantitae. 12
- La terza cortexia si è : no si tropo presto
 De corre senza parola per asetare al descho ;
 Se alchun te invida a noxe, anze che tu sie asetato,
 Per ti no prende quello axio, d'onde tu fuzi deschazato. 16

<sup>1</sup> Bonvexino (pronounced Bonvesino) is, in modern Italian, Bonvicino—i. e. good neighbour.

<sup>2</sup> 'Afresh' represents the Italian 'de frescho.' Signor Biondelli considers that the phrase means 'afresh,' indicating that Fra Bonvesino had written his Courtesies in Latin before turning them into Italian. Signor Biondelli, however, admits that 'de frescho' may also mean 'now recently,' 'just now' ;

THE
FIFTY COURTESIES FOR THE TABLE,
OF FRA BONVESINO<sup>1</sup> DA RIVA.

---

Fra Bonvesino da Riva, who lived in the town of Legnano,
First treated of the Courtesies for the Table.
Of the Fifty Courtesies which should be observed at the board
Fra Bonvesino da Riva now speaks afresh.<sup>2</sup> 4

The first is this: that, when thou art at table,
Thou think first of the poor and needy;
For, when thou feedest the poor, thou feedest thy Lord,
Who will feed thee, after thy death, in the eternal bliss. 8

The second Courtesy. If thou offerest water for the hands,
Offer it neatly: see thou be not rude.
Offer enough water, not too much, when it is summer-time:
In winter, for the cold, in small quantity. 12

The third Courtesy is—Be not too quick
To run without a word to sit down at the board.
If any one invites thee to a wedding,<sup>3</sup> before thou art seated, and, but for his contrary preference, I should attribute that meaning to the word in the present instance.
Take not for thyself a place from which thou wouldst be turned out.

<sup>3</sup> 'Noxe.' I suppose this must represent the modern-Italian word 'nozze,' nuptials, though the incident of a wedding seems rather suddenly introduced at this point, and does not re-appear afterwards.

L' oltra è : Anze che tu prendi lo cibo aparegiao
 Per ti, over per tò mayore, fa sì ch' el sie segniao.
 Tropo è gordo e vilan, e incontra Cristo malegna
 Lo quale alli oltri guarda, ni lo sò condugio no segna. 20

La cortexia zinquena : sta aconzamente al descho,
 Cortexe, adorno, alegro, e confortoxo e frescho ;
 No di' sta convitoroxo, ni gramo, ni travachao ;
 Ni con le gambe in croxe, ni torto, ni apodiaio. 24

La cortexia sexena : da poy che l' omo se fiada,
 Sia cortexe no apodiasse sovra la mensa bandia ;
 Chi fa dra mensa podio, quello homo non è cortexe,
 Quando el gh'apodia le gambe, over ghe ten le braze destexe. 28

La cortexia setena si è : in tuta zente
 No tropo mangiare, ni pocho ; ma temperadamente ;
 Quello homo en ch' el se sia, che mangia tropo, ni pocho,
 No vego quentro pro ghe sia al'anima, ni al corpo. 32

La cortexia ogena si è : che Deo n' acrescha,
 No tropo imple la bocha, ni tropo mangia inpressa ;
 Lo gordo che mangia inpressa, e che mangia a bocha piena,
 Quando el fisse apellavo, no ve responde apena. 36

La cortexia novena si è : a pocho parlare,
 Et a tenere pox quello che l' à tolegio a fare ;
 Che l' omo tan fin ch' el mangia, s' el usa tropo a dire,
 Le ferגיע fora dra bocha sovenzo pon insire. 40

La cortexia dexena si è : quando tu è sede,
 Travonde inanze lo cibo, e furbe la bocha, e beve.
 Lo gordo che beve inpressa, inanze ch' el voja la chana ;
 Al' altro fa fastidio che beve sego in compagnia. 44

<sup>1</sup> Signor Biondelli understands this stanza in a somewhat different sense, as applying to the assigning of dishes, not the signing of the cross as a grace be-

The next is—Before thou takest the food prepared,
 See that it be signed [with the cross] by thyself or thy better.
 Too greedy and churlish is he, and he offends against Christ,
 Who looks about at others, and signs not his dish.<sup>1</sup> 20

The fifth Courtesy. Sit properly at the board,
 Courteous, well-dressed, cheerful, and obliging and fresh.
 Thou must not sit anxious, nor dismal, nor lolling,
 Nor with thy legs crossed, nor awry, nor leaning forward. 24

The sixth Courtesy. When people are at a pause,
 Be careful not to lean forward on the laid-out table.
 He who uses the table as a prop, that man is not courteous,
 When he tilts his legs upon it, or stretches out his arms along it. 28

The seventh Courtesy is—For all people
 Not to eat too much nor little, but temperately.
 That man, whoever he may be, who eats too much or little,
 I see not what good it can be to his soul or his body. 32

The eighth Courtesy is—So may God favour us,
 Fill not thy mouth too much, nor eat in too great a hurry.
 The glutton who eats in a hurry, and who eats with his mouth stuffed,
 If he were addressed, he scarcely answers you. 36

The ninth Courtesy is—To speak little,
 And stick to that which one has set-to at doing ;
 For a man, as long as he is eating, if he has the habit of talking too much,
 Scraps may often spurt out of his mouth. 40

The tenth Courtesy is—When thou art thirsty,
 First swallow down thy food, and wipe thy mouth, and drink.
 The glutton who drinks in a hurry, before he has emptied his gullet,
 Makes himself disagreeable to the other who is drinking in his company. 44

fore meat. The reference to Christ seems to me to create a strong presumption in favour of my interpretation.

E la undexena è questa : no sporze la copa al' altro,
 Quando el ghe pò atenze, s' el no te fesse acorto ;
 Zashuno homo prenda la copa quando ghe plaxe ;
 E quando el l' à beudo, l' à de mete zoxo in paxe. 48

La dodexena è questa : quando tu di' prende la copa,
 Con dove mane la rezeve, e ben te furbe la bocha ;
 Con l'una conzamente no se pò la ben receive ;
 Azò ch' el vino no se spanda, con doe mane di' beve. 52

La tredexena è questa : se ben tu no voy beve,
 S' alchun te sporze la copa, sempre la di' rezeve ;
 Quando tu l' à receuda, ben tosto la pò mete via ;
 Over sporze a un' altro ch' è tego in compagnia. 56

L' oltre che segue è questa : quando tu è alli convivi,
 Onde si à bon vin in descho, guarda che tu no t' invrie ;
 Che se invria matamente, in tre maynere offende ;
 El noxe al corpo e al' anima, e perde lo vin ch' el spende. 60

La quindexena è questa : seben verun ariva,
 No leva in pè dal descho, se grande cason no ghe sia ;
 Tan fin tu mangi al descho, non di' moverse inlora,
 Per amore de fare careze a quilli che te veraveno sovra. 64

La sedexena apresso con veritae :
 No sorbilar dra bocha quando tu mangi con cugial ;
 Quello fa sicom bestia, chi con cugial sorbilìa ;
 Chi doncha à questa usanza, ben fa s' el se dispolia. 68

La desetena apresso si è : quando tu stranude,
 Over ch' el te prende la tosse, guarda con tu làvori
 In oltra parte te volze, ed è cortexia inpensa,
 Azò che dra sariva no zesse sor la mensa. 72

<sup>1</sup> It is clear from the general context that the victuals here spoken of as to be eaten with a spoon are solid edibles—not merely soups or the like : the spoon corresponding to the modern fork. The word translated 'suck' is 'sor-

And the eleventh is this : Do not offer the cup to another
 When he can himself reach it, unless he asks thee for it.
 Let every man take the cup when he pleases ;
 And, when he has drunk, he should set it down quietly. 48

The twelfth is this : When thou hast to take the cup,
 Hold it with both hands, and wipe thy mouth well.
 With one [hand] it cannot well be held properly :
 In order that the wine be not spilled, thou must drink using both hands. 52

The thirteenth is this : If even thou dost not want to drink,
 If anybody offers thee the cup, thou must always accept it.
 When thou hast accepted it, thou mayst very soon set it down,
 Or else offer it to another who is in company with thee. 56

The next that follows is this : When thou art at entertainments
 Where there is good wine on the board, see that thou get not drunk.
 He who gets mad-drunk offends in three ways :
 He harms his body and his soul, and loses the wine which he consumes. 60

The fifteenth is this : If any one arrives,
 Rise not up from the board unless there be great reason therefor.
 As long as thou eatest at the board, thou shouldst not then move
 For the sake of making much of those who may come in to thee. 64

The sixteenth next in good sooth.
 Suck not with the mouth when thou eatest with a spoon.<sup>1</sup>
 He acts like a beast who sucks with a spoon :
 Therefore whoever has this habit does well in ridding himself of it.

The seventeenth afterwards is this : When thou dost sneeze,
 Or if a cough seizes thee, mind thy lips :
 Turn aside, and reflect that that is courtesy,
 So that no saliva may get on the table. 72

bilar : ' perhaps 'mumble' would convey the force of the precept more fully though less literally.

La desogena è questa : quando l' omo sente ben sano,
 No faza onde el se sia del companadego pan ;
 Quello ch' è lechardo de carne, over d'ove, over de formagio,
 Anche n' abielo d'avanzo, perzò no de 'l fa stragio. 76

La dexnovena è questa : no blasma li condugi
 Quando tu è alli convivi ; ma di, che l'in bon tugi.
 In questa rea usanza multi homini ò za trovao,
 Digando : questo è mal cogio, o questo è mal salao. 80

E la XX.<sup>a</sup> è questa : ale toe menestre atende ;
 Entre altru' no guarda, se no forse per imprende
 Lo menistrante, s' el ghe manca ben de guardà per tuto ;
 Mal s' el no menestresse clave e se lovo è bruto. 84

La XXI.<sup>a</sup> è questa : no mastrulare per tuto
 Como avesse carne, over ove, over semiante condugio ;
 Chi volze, over chi mastrulia sur lo taliere zerehando,
 È bruto, e fa fastidio al compagnon mangiando. 88

La XXII.<sup>a</sup> è questa : no te reze vilanamente ;
 Se tu mangi con verun d'uno pan comunamente,
 Talia lo pan per ordine, no va taliando per tuto ;
 No va taliando da le parte, se tu no voy essere bruto. 92

La XXIII.<sup>a</sup> : no di' metere pan in vino,
 Se tego d'un napo medesmo bevesse Fra Bon Vexino ;
 Chi vole peschare entro vin, bevando d'un napo conmeogo,
 Per meo grao, se eyo poesse, no bevereve consego. 96

La XXIII.<sup>a</sup> è : no mete in parte per mezo lo compagnon
 Ni grelin, ni squela, se no ghe fosse gran raxon ;
 Over grelin, over squela se tu voy mete inparte,
 Per mezo ti lo di' mete pur da la toa parte. 100

<sup>1</sup> I feel some doubt as to the meaning of this passage.

<sup>2</sup> This appears to be the general sense of the last two lines. In the final one Signor Biondelli gives up two words as unintelligible : he infers that they must be miscopied.

The eighteenth is this : When a man feels himself quite comfortable,
Let him not leave bread over after the victuals.<sup>1</sup>

He who has a taste for meat, or for eggs, or for cheese,
Even though he should have a residue, he should not on that account waste it. 76

The nineteenth is this : Blame not the dishes
When thou art at entertainments, but say that they are all good.
I have detected many men erewhile in this vile habit,
Saying 'This is ill cooked,' or 'this is ill salted.' 80

And the twentieth is this : Attend to thine own sops ;
Peer not into those of others, unless perchance to apprise
The attendant if anything is wanting. He must look well all round :
Things would go much amiss if he were not to attend.<sup>2</sup> 84

The twenty-first is this : Do not poke about everywhere,
When thou hast meat, or eggs, or some such dish.
He who turns and pokes about on the platter, searching,<sup>3</sup>
Is unpleasant, and annoys his companion at dinner. 88

The twenty-second is this : Do not behave rudely.
If thou art eating from one loaf in common with any one,
Cut the loaf as it comes, do not go cutting all about ;
Do not go cutting one part and then another, if thou wouldst not be uncouth. 92

The twenty-third. Thou must not dip bread into wine
If Fra Bonvesino has to drink out of the same bowl with thee.
He who will fish in the wine, drinking in one bowl with me,
I for my own liking, if so I could, would not drink with him. 96

The twenty-fourth is—Set not down right before thy companion
Either pan or pot, unless there be great reason therefor.
If thou wantest to introduce either pan or pot,
Thou must set it down at thine own side, before thyself. 100

<sup>3</sup> This seems to contemplate the plan of the several guests helping themselves off the dish brought to table. At any rate, so Signor Biondelli understands it.

La XXV.<sup>a</sup> è: chi fosse con femene sovra un talier mangiando,
 La carne a se e a lor ghe debia esser taliata;
 Lo homo de' plu esse intento, plu presto e honoreure,
 Che no de' per raxon la femena agonzente. 104

La XXVI.<sup>a</sup> è questa: de grande bontà inpensa,
 Quando lo tò bon amigo mangia alla toa mensa;
 Se tu talie carne, over pesso, over oltre bone pitanze,
 De la plu bella parte ghe debie cerne inanze. 108

La XXVII.<sup>a</sup> è questa: no di' tropo agrezare
 L'amigo a caxa tova de beve, ni de mangiare;
 Ben di' tu receive l'amigo e farghe bella cera,
 E darghe ben da spende e consolare voluntera. 112

La XXVIII.<sup>a</sup> è questa: apresso grande homo mangiando,
 Astalete de mangiare tan fin che l'è bevando;
 Mangiando apresso d'un vescho, tan fin ch'el beve dra copa,
 Usanza drita prende; no mastegare dra bocha. 116

La XXVIII.<sup>a</sup> è questa: se grande homo è da provo.
 No di' beve sego a una hora, anze ghe di' dà logo;
 Chi fosse a provo d'un vescho, tan fin ch'el beverage,
 No di' levà lo sò napo, over ch'el vargarave. 120

E la trentena è questa: che serve, abia neteza;
 No faza in lo prexente ni spuda, ni bruteza;
 Al' homo tan fin ch'el mangia, plu tosto fa fastidio;
 No pò tropo esse neto chi serve a uno convivio. 124

Pox la XXX.<sup>a</sup> è questa: zashun cortese donzello
 Che se vore mondà lo naxo, con li drapi se faza bello;
 Chi mangia, over chi menestra, no de' sofia con le die;
 Con li drapi da pey se monda vostra cortexia. 128

<sup>1</sup> 'Donzello.' This precept seems to be especially addressed to the servitors. Ugucione Pisano, quoted by Muratori, says: 'Domicelli et Domicella dicuntur quando pulchri juvenes magnatum sunt sicut servientes.' Such Donzelli

The twenty-fifth is—One who may be eating from a platter with women,

The meat has to be carved for himself and for them.

The man must be more attentive, more prompt in honouring,

Than the woman, in reason, has to reciprocate. 104

The twenty-sixth is this: Count it as a great kindness

When thy good friend eats at thy table.

If thou carvest meat, or fish, or other good viands,

Thou must choose of the best part for him. 108

The twenty-seventh is this: Thou must not overmuch press

Thy friend in thy house to drink or to eat.

Thou must receive thy friend well, and make him welcome,

And heartily give him plenty to eat and enjoy himself with. 112

The twenty-eighth is this: Dining with a great man,

Abstain from eating so long as he is drinking.

Dining with a Bishop, so long as he is drinking from the cup,

Right usage requires thou shouldst not be chewing with the mouth.

The twenty-ninth is this: If a great man is beside thee,

Thou must not drink at the same time with him, but give him precedence.

Who may be beside a Bishop, so long as he is drinking

Or pouring out, must not raise his bowl. 120

And the thirtieth is this: He who serves, let him be cleanly.

Let him not make in presence [of the guests] any spitting or nastiness:

To a man as long as he is eating, this is all the more offensive.

He who serves at an entertainment cannot be too nice. 124

Next after the thirtieth is this: Every courteous donzel<sup>1</sup>

Who wants to wipe his nose, let him embellish himself with a cloth.

He who eats, or who is serving, must not blow through the fingers.

Be so obliging as to clean yourselves with the foot-cloths.<sup>2</sup> 128 were not allowed to sit at table with the knights; or, if allowed, had to sit apart on a lower seat.

<sup>2</sup> 'Drapa da pey.' I confess to some uncertainty as to what sort of thing

L'oltra che ven è questa ; le toe man siano nete ;
 Ni le die entro le oregie, ni le man sul cho di' mete ;
 No de' l'omo che mangia habere nudritura,
 A berdugare con le die in parte, onde sia sozura. 132

La terza poxe la XXX.<sup>a</sup> : no brancorar con le man,
 Tan fin tu mangi al descho, ni gate, ni can ;
 No è lecito allo cortexo a brancorare li bruti
 Con le man, con le que al tocha li condugi. 136

L'oltra è : tan fin tu mangi con homini cognosenti,
 No mete le die in bocha per descolzare li dingi.
 Chi caza le die in bocha, anze che l'abia mangiao,
 Sur lo talier connego no mangia per mè gao. 140

La quinta poxe la trenta : tu no di' lenze le die ;
 Le die chi le caza in bocha brutalmente furbe ;
 Quello homo che se caza in bocha le die inpastruiate,
 Le die no én plu nete, anze son plu brute. 144

La sesta cortexia poxe la trenta :
 S' el te fa mestere parlà, no parla a bocha plena ;
 Chi parla, e chi responde, se l' à plena la bocha,
 Apena ch' el possa laniare negota. 148

Poxe questa ven quest'oltra : tan fin ch' el compagno
 Avrà lo napo alla bocha, no ghe fa domando,
 Se ben tu lo vo' apelare ; de zò te fazo avezudo ;
 No l'inpaggià, daghe logo tan fin che l'avrà beudo. 152

these 'foot-cloths' may have been. Signor Biondelli terms them 'the cloths wherewith the feet were wrapped round and dried.' He adds : 'This precept apprizes us that at that time the use of a pocket-handkerchief was not yet introduced, and perhaps not even the use of stockings.' One would fain hope that the summit of Lombardie good breeding in 1290 was not the wiping of noses on cloths actually and at the moment serving for the feet. Possibly drapi du pey is here a generic term ; cloths or napkins at hand for use, and which might have served for foot-cloths. Thus the word 'duster' might be employed in a similar connection, without our being compelled to suppose that the individual duster had first been used on the spot for dusting the tables or

The next that comes is this: Let thy hands be clean.

Thou must not put either thy fingers into thine ears, or thy hands on thy head.

The man who is eating must not be cleaning
By scraping with his fingers at any foul part.

132

The third after the thirtieth. Stroke not with hands,
As long as thou eatest at the board, cat or dog.

A courteous man is not warranted in stroking brutes
With the hands with which he touches the dishes.

136

The next is—As long as thou art eating with men of breeding,
Put not thy fingers into thy mouth to pick thy teeth.

He who sticks his fingers in his mouth, before he has done eating,
Eats not, with my good-will, on the platter with me.

140

The fifth after the thirtieth. Thou must not lick thy fingers. ✓

He who thrusts his fingers into his mouth cleans them nastily. ✓

That man who thrusts into his mouth his besmeared fingers, ✓

His fingers are none the cleaner, but rather the nastier. ✓

144

The sixth Courtesy after the thirtieth. ✓

If thou hast occasion to speak, speak not with thy mouth full. ✓

He who speaks, and he who answers, if he has his mouth full, ✓

Scarcely can he chop out a word.

148

After this comes this other: As long as thy companion ✓

Has the bowl to his mouth, ask him no questions

If thou wouldst address him: of this I give thee notice.

Disturb him not: pause until he has drunk.

152

floors, and then for wiping the nose. Or indeed, we moderns, who wipe our noses on hand-kerchiefs, do not first use said kerchiefs for wiping our hands, nor yet for covering our heads ('couvre chef').—Reverting to Signor Biondelli's observation as to 'the use of stockings,' I may observe that Francesco da Barberino, in a passage of his Reggimento e Costumi delle Donne, speaks of 'the beautiful foot shod in silk'—'calzato in seta'—which may imply either a stocking or else a shoe. This poem, as we shall see further on, is but little later than Bonvicino's. ~~The reader may also observe, at p. 68, the horror with which a much later writer, Della Casa, contemplated the use of a dinner-napkin as a pocket-handkerchief.~~

La XXXVIII.<sup>a</sup> è questa : no recuntare ree novelle,
 Azò che quilli ch' in tego, no mangiano con recore ;
 Tan fin che li oltri mangiano, no di nove angosoxe ;
 Ma taxe, over di parole che siano confortoxe. 156

L' oltra che segue è questa : se tu mangi con persone,
 No fa remore, ni tapie, se ben gh' avise raxone ;
 S' alchun de li toy vargasse, passa oltra fin a tempo,
 Azò che quilli ch' in tego, no abiano turbamento. 160

L' oltra è : se dolia te prende de qualche infirmitade,
 Al più tu poy comprime la toa necessitade ;
 Se mal te senti al descho, no dimostrà la pena ;
 Che tu no fazi recore a quilli che mangiano tego insema. 164

Pox quella ven quest' oltra : se entro mangial vegisse
 Qualche sghivosa cossa, ai oltri no desisse ;
 Over moscha, over qual sozura entro mangial vezando,
 Taxe, ch'eli no abiano sghivo al descho mangiando. 168

L' oltra è : se tu porte squelle al descho per servire,
 Sur la riva dra squella le porexe di' tenere :
 Se tu apili le squelle cor porexe sur la riva,
 Tu le poy mete zoxo in sò logo senza altro che t' ayda. 172

La terza poxe la quaranta è : se tu sporzi la copa,
 La sumità del napo col polexe may no tocha ;
 Apilia lo napo de soto, e sporze con una man ;
 Chi ten per altra via, pò fi digio, che sia vilan. 176

La quarta poxe la quaranta si è : chi vol odire :
 Ni grelin, ni squelle, ni 'l napo no di' trop' inpire ;
 Mesura e modo de' esse in tute le cosse che sia ;
 Chi oltra zò vargasse, no ave fà cortexia. 180

The thirty-eighth is this : Tell no bad news,
 In order that those who are with thee may not eat out of spirits.
 As long as the others are eating, give no painful news ;
 But keep silence, or else speak in cheerful terms. 156

The next that follows is this : If thou art eating with others,
 Make no uproar or disturbance, even though thou shouldst have reason therefor.

If any of thy companions should transgress, pass it by till the time comes,
 So that those who are with thee may not be put out. 160

The next is—If the pain of any ill-health seizes thee, ✓
 Keep down thy distress as much as thou canst.
 If thou feelest ill at the board, show not the pain,
 That thou mayst not cause discomfort to those who are eating along with thee. 164

After that comes this other : Shouldst thou see in the viands ✓
 Any disagreeable thing, tell it not to the others.
 Seeing in the viands either a fly or any uncleanness,
 Keep silence, that they may not feel disgust, eating at the board. 168

The next is—If thou bringest dishes to the board in serving,
 Thou must keep thy thumbs on the rim of the dish.
 If thou takest hold with the thumb on the rim of the dishes, Thou canst set them down in their place without any one else to help thee. 172

The third after the fortieth is—If thou offerest the cup,
 Never touch with the thumb the upper edge of the bowl.
 Hold the bowl at the under end, and present it with one hand :
 He who holds it otherwise may be called boorish. 176

The fourth after the fortieth is—hear who will—
 Neither frying-pan nor dishes nor bowl should be overfilled.
 Measure and moderation should be in all things that are :
 He who should transcend this will not have done courtesy. 180

L' oltra che segue è questa : reten a ti lo cugiale,
 Se te fi tolegio la squella per azonzere de lo mangiale ;
 Se l' è lo cugial entro la squella, lo ministrante inpilia ;
 In tute le cortexie ben fa chi s' asetilia. 184

L' oltra è questa : se tu mangi con cugial,
 No debie infolcire tropo pan entro mangiare ;
 Quello che fa impiastro entro mangià da fogo,
 El fa fastidio a quilli che ghe mangiano da provo. 188

L' oltra che segue è questa : s' el tò anigo è tego,
 Tan fin ch' el mangia al descho, sempre bochona sego ;
 Se forse t' astalasse, ni fosse sazio anchora,
 Forse anchora s' astalarave per vergonza inlora. 192

L' oltra è : mangiando con oltri a qualche inviamento,
 No mete entr' a guayna lo tò cortelo anze tempo ;
 No guerna lo cortello anze ch' alo compagno ;
 Forse altro ven in descho d'onde tu no fè raxon. 196

La cortexia seguente è : quando tu è mangiao,
 Fa sì che Jesu Xristo ne sia glorificao.
 Quel che rezeve servixio d'alchun obediente,
 S'elo no lo regratia, tropo è deschnosente. 200

La cinquantena per la darera :
 Lavare le man, poy beve dro bon vino dra carera :
 Le man poxe lo convivio per pocho pèn si lavae,
 Da grassa e da sozura e l'in netezac. 204

V<sup>1</sup> 'Chi s' asetilia.' Signor Biondelli cannot assign the exact sense of this verb. I should suppose it to be either a form of 'Assettarsi,' to settle oneself, to keep one's place, or a corruption of 'Assottigliarsi,' to subtilize, to be punctilious, to 'look sharp.'

<sup>2</sup> 'D' alchun obediente.' This phrase, if directly connected with the 'Jesu Xristo' of the previous line, seems peculiar. I am not quite clear whether

The next which follows is this : Keep thy spoon,
 If thy plate is removed for the adding of some viands.
 If the spoon is in the plate, it puts out the helper.
 In all courtesies he does well who is heedful.<sup>1</sup> 184

The next is this : If thou art eating with a spoon,
 Thou must not stuff too much bread into the victuals.
 He who lays it on thick upon the cooked meats
 Is distasteful to those who are eating beside him. 188

The next that follows is this : If thy friend is with thee,
 As long as he eats at the board, always keep up with him.
 If thou perchance wert to leave off, and he were not yet satisfied,
 Maybe he also would then leave off through bashfulness. 192

The next is—Dining with others by some invitation,
 Put not back thy knife into the sheath before the time :
 Deposit not thy knife ere thy companion.
 Perhaps something else is coming to table which thou dost not reckon for. 196

The succeeding Courtesy is—When thou hast eaten,
 So do as that Jesus Christ be glorified therein.
 He who receives service from any that obeys,<sup>2</sup>
 If he thanks him not, is too ungrateful. 200

The fiftieth for the last.
 Wash hands, then drink of the good and choice wine.<sup>3</sup>
 After the meal, the hands may be a little washed,
 And cleansed from grease and impurity. 204

the whole stanza is to be understood as an injunction to render grace after meat, in thankfulness for what Christ has given one—or to thank the servants who have been waiting at table, and so to glorify Christ by an act of humility.

<sup>3</sup> 'Dro bon vino dra carera.' The general sense is evidently near what the translation gives : but Signor Biondelli is unable to assign the precise sense. No wonder therefore that I am unable.

As far as I know (though I cannot affect to speak with authority) this poem by Fra Bonvicino, and those by Francesco da Barberino of which we shall next take cognisance, are considerably the oldest still extant Courtesy-Books (expressly to be so termed) of Christianized Europe;<sup>1</sup> except one, partly coming under the same definition, which has been mentioned to me by a well-read friend, Dr Heimann (of University College), but of which I have no direct personal knowledge.<sup>2</sup> This also, though written in the German language, is the production of an Italian. It is entitled Der Wälsche Gast (the Italian Guest), and dates about 1210. The author's name is given as Tomasin von Zirclaria, born in Friuli. The book supplies various rules of etiquette, in a very serious and well-intentioned tone, as I am informed.—Fra Bonvicino would, on the ground of his antiquity alone, be well deserving of study. His precepts moreover (with comparatively few exceptions) cannot even yet be called obsolete, though some of them are unsophisticated to the extent of being superfluous. In order that the reader may see in one coup d'œil the whole of this curious old monument I subjoin a classified abridgment of the injunctions :—

1. Moral and Religious.

To think of the poor first of all.

To remember grace before meat.

To eat enough, and not too much.

Not to get drunk.

To pass over for the time any cause of quarrel.

To say grace after meat.

2. Practical Rules still fairly operative.

To offer water for washing the hands before dinner.

Not to plump into a seat at table at haphazard.

To sit at table decorously and in good humour.

<sup>1</sup> Several others must nevertheless have been written before or about the same time; for Barberino himself, in the exordium to his Reggimento e Costumi delle Donne, says—

‘There have been many who wrote books

Concerning the elegant manners of men, but not of women.’

<sup>2</sup> A full account of it by Mr Eugene Oswald follows the present Essay.

Not to tilt oneself forward on the table.

Not to gorge or bolt one's food.

To subordinate talking to eating.

Not to drink with one's mouth full.

To remain seated at table, even though fresh guests should arrive.

Not to suck at solid food eaten with a spoon.

To use up one's bread.

To abstain from raising objections to the dinner.

Not to scrutinize one's neighbour's plate.

To cut bread as it comes, not in all sorts of ways.

To carve for the ladies.

To give the guests prime cuts.

To make the guests thoroughly welcome, without oppressive urgencies.

To abstain at dinner from stroking cats and dogs.

Not to speak with one's mouth full.

To abstain from imparting bad news at dinner.

To keep down any symptoms of pain or illness.

To avoid calling attention to anything disagreeable which may accidentally be in the dishes.

The attendants to hold the dishes by their rims.

Not to hand round the bowl by its upper edge.

Not to overload the dishes, goblets, &c.

Not to hurry through with one's eating, so that others, who are left behind, would feel uncomfortable.

To wash hands and drink the best wine after dinner.

3. Rules equally true and primitive.

Not to tilt one's legs on the table between-whiles.

To turn aside if one sneezes or coughs.

Not to set down before the guests utensils fresh from the kitchen.

The attendants to be clean—not to spit, &c.

To blow one's nose on 'foot-cloths,' not through the fingers.

Not to scratch at one's head or elsewhere.

Not to pick one's teeth with the fingers.

Not to lick one's fingers clean.

4. Rules which may be regarded as over-punctilious or obsolete.

Not to sit at table with one's legs crossed.

To offer the cup to others only when they want it. (The rules as to drinking seem throughout to contemplate that two or more guests are using one cup or vessel.)

To use both hands in drinking.

Never to decline the cup when another offers it, but to drink no more than one wishes. (This rule still has its analogue at tables where the custom lingers of requesting 'the pleasure of taking wine with' some one else.)

Not to rummage about in the dish from which one is eating along with others.

Not to dip bread into the wine of which one is drinking along with others.

To suspend eating while a man of importance is drinking.

To postpone drinking till the man of importance has finished.

Not to speak to a man who is in the act of drinking. (This rule seems to contemplate 'potations pottle-deep,' such as engage all one's energies for some little while together: for a mere modern sip at a wine-glass such a rule would be superfluous.)

To retain one's spoon when one's plate is removed for another help. (One spoon, it may be inferred, is to last all through the meal, serving as a fork.)

Not to eat an excessive quantity of bread with the viands.

Not to re-place one's knife in its sheath prematurely. (It may be presumed that each guest brings his own knife.)

The reader who considers these rules in their several categories, and with due allowance for difference of times, manners, and 'properties,' will, I think, agree with me in seeing that the essentials of courtesy at table in Lombardy in the thirteenth century, and in England in the nineteenth, are, after all, closely related; and that, while some of our Friar's tutorings would now happily be supererogatory, and others are inapplicable to present dining conveniences, not one is ill-bred in any correct use of that word. The details of etiquette vary indefinitely: the sense of courtesy is substantially one and the same. In Fra Bonvicino's manual, it appears constantly in its genuine aspect, and prompted by its truest spirit—not so much that of personal correctness, each man for his own credit, as of uniform consideration for others.

The same is eminently the case with some of the precepts given by our next author, Francesco da Barberino. Nothing, for instance, can go beyond the true rationale of courtesy conveyed in the following injunction<sup>1</sup> (which we must not here degrade from its grace of Tuscan speech and verse):

‘ Colli minor sì taci,
E prendi il loco che ti danno ; e pensa
Che, per far qui difesa,
Faresti lor, per tuo vizio, villani.’

Or this:<sup>2</sup>

‘ E credo che fa male
Colui che taglia essendo a suo maggiore :
Chè non v' è servitore
S'el non dimanda prima la licenza.’

Indeed, I think that the tone prevalent throughout Barberino's maxims of courtesy on all sorts of points is fairly to be called exquisite. Our extract from him brings us (it may be well to remember) into the closest contact with the social usages which Dante in his youth must have been cognisant of and conforming to ; for, in passing from Bonvicino to Barberino, we have passed from Lombardy to Tuscany—the latter poet being a native of the Val d'Elsa, in the same district as Boccaccio's birth-place, Certaldo. The date assigned to Barberino's work, the Documenti d'Amore, is just about the same as that of Bonvicino's, or from 1290 to 1296. Yet I apprehend we must receive this early date with some hesitation. In 1290 Barberino was but twenty-six years of age ; whereas the Documenti d'Amore, a lengthy and systematic treatise on all kinds of moral and social duties and proprieties, seems to be rich with the hoarded experience of years. That so young a man should even have sketched out for himself a work of such axiomatic oracularity seems à priori unlikely, though one has to accept the fact on authority : that he should towards that age have completed the poem as we now possess it appears to me barely compatible with possibility. His other long poem, still more singular on the like account, is referred to nearly the same date. I observe in it, however, one passage (Part 6) which must have been written after 1308, and probably after 1312. It refers to a story which had been narrated to Barberino 'one time that he was in Paris.' Now his journey on a mission to Provence and France began in 1309, and ended in 1313.

<sup>1</sup> This injunction forms stanza 4 in our extract from Barberino beginning at p. 38.

<sup>2</sup> See at p. 40, the stanza beginning ‘ And I think that he does amiss.’

I shall here give place to my brother, and extract verbatim the notice of Barberino contained in his book of translations, The Early Italian Poets.<sup>1</sup>

'Francesco da Barberino : born 1264, died 1348.

'With the exception of Brunetto Latini (whose poems are neither very poetical nor well adapted for extract), Francesco da Barberino shows by far the most sustained productiveness among the poets who preceded Dante, or were contemporaries of his youth. Though born only one year in advance of Dante, Barberino seems to have undertaken, if not completed, his two long poetic treatises some years before the commencement of the Commedia.

'This poet was born at Barberino di Valdelsa, of a noble family, his father being Neri di Ranuccio da Barberino. Up to the year of his father's death, 1296, he pursued the study of law chiefly in Bologna and Padua ; but afterwards removed to Florence for the same purpose, and became one of the many distinguished disciples of Brunetto Latini,<sup>2</sup> who probably had more influence than any other one man in forming the youth of his time to the great things they accomplished. After this he travelled in France and elsewhere ; and on his return to Italy in 1313, was the first who, by special favour of Pope Clement V., received the grade of Doctor of Laws in Florence. Both as lawyer and as citizen, he held great trusts, and discharged them honourably. He was twice married, the name of his second wife being Barna di Tano, and had several children. At the age of eighty-four he died in the great plague of Florence. Of the two works which Barberino has left, one bears the title of Documenti d'Amore, literally Documents<sup>1</sup> of Love, but perhaps more properly rendered as Laws of Courtesy; while the other is called Del Reggimento e dei Costumi delle Donne,—of the Government and Conduct of Women. They may be described, in the main, as manuals of good breeding or social chivalry—the one for men, and the other for women. Mixed with vagueness, tediousness, and not seldom with artless absurdity, they contain much simple wisdom, much curious record of manners, and (as my specimens show) occasional poetic sweetness or power—though these last are far from being their most prominent merits. The first-named treatise, however, has much more of such qualities than the second, and contains moreover passages of homely humour which startle by their truth, as if written yesterday. At the same time, the second book is quite as well worth reading, for the sake of its authoritative minuteness in matters which ladies now-a-days would probably consider their own undisputed region, and also for the quaint gravity of certain surprising prose anecdotes of real life with which it is interspersed. Both these works remained long unprinted; the first edition of the Documenti d'Amore being that edited by Ubaldini in 1640, at which time he reports the Reggimento &c. to be only possessed by his age “in name and in desire.” This treatise was afterwards brought to light, but never printed till 1815. I should not forget to state that Barberino attained some knowledge of drawing; and that Ubaldini had seen his original MS of the Documenti, containing, as he says, skilful miniatures by the author.

<sup>1</sup> The Early Italian Poets, from Ciullo d'Alcamo to Dante Alighieri (1100-1200-1300), in the Original Metres : together with Dante's Vita Nuova. Translated by D. G. Rossetti. Smith and Elder, 1862.

<sup>2</sup> There is evidently something erroneous in this statement : Brunetto died in 1294. The Editor of a collection of Italian Poets (Lirici del Secolo secondo, &c.—Venezia, Antonelli, 1841) says : 'Francesco went through his first studies under Brunetto Latini. Hence he passed to the Universities of Padua and of Bologna.' Barberino being a Tuscan, this seems the natural course for him to adopt, rather than to have gone to Padua and Bologna before Florence. My brother's remark, as to the death of Neri in 1296, and as to Francesco's subsequent sojourn in Florence, agrees, however, with the statement made by Tiraboschi : apparently we should understand that Francesco had been in Florence both before and after his stay in Padua and Bologna, and that his studies under Brunetto pertain to the earlier period.

‘Barberino never appears to have taken a very active part in politics, but he inclined to the Imperial and Ghibelline party. This contributes with other things to render it rather singular that we find no poetic correspondence or apparent communication of any kind between him and his many great countrymen, contemporaries of his long life, and with whom he had more than one bond of sympathy. His career stretched from Dante, Guido Cavalcanti, and Cino da Pistoia, to Petrarca and Boccaccio: yet only in one respectful but not enthusiastic notice of him by the last-named writer (Genealogia degli Dei) do we ever meet with an allusion to him by any of the greatest men of his time. Nor in his own writings, as far as I remember, are they ever referred to. His epitaph is said to have been written by Boccaccio, but this is doubtful. On reviewing the present series, I am sorry, on the whole, not to have included more specimens of Barberino; whose writings, though not very easy to tackle in the mass, would afford an excellent field for selection and summary.’

<sup>1</sup> Teachings or Lessonings of Love might probably express the sense more exactly to an English ear.

Thus far my brother. I will only add to his biographical details that, at the very end of Francesco da Barberino's life, he and one of his sons were elected the Priori, or joint chief-magistrates of the Florentine Republic; and that the Barberini who came to the papal chair in 1623 as Urban VIII. was of the same family. His patronymic is enshrined to many loose memories in the epigram 'Quod non fecere Barbari fecere Barberini.' To all that my brother has said of the qualities, and especially the merits, of Francesco, I cordially subscribe. The Documenti d'Amore is really a most capital book,—I should suppose, unsurpassed of its kind, and also in its interest for students of the early mediæval manners, and modes of thought. Its diction is remarkably condensed—(Italian scholars say that it shows strong traces of the author's Provençal studies and predilections)—and it is proportionately stiff work to hasty readers. Those who will peruse it deliberately, and weigh its words, find many niceties of laconism, and much terse and sententious good sense as well—lengthy as is the entire book. This is indeed no slight matter—twelve sections, and something like 8500 lines. It is exactly the sort of work to elicit and to account for editorial enthusiasm.

I extract in full the stanzas bearing directly upon that which (following the impulsion of Fra Bonvicino) has become our more immediate subject—the Courtesies of the Table. The tone of society which we find here is visibly in advance of the Lombard Friar's, though the express precepts of the two writers have a good deal of general resemblance: the superiority in this respect is very much the same as in the language. Barberino's diction seems quite worthy of a Tuscan contemporary of Dante, and his works are still drawn upon as a 'testo di lingua.'

'The third point of good manners
Which thou art to observe at table
Thou mayst receive thus;
Thinking out for thyself the other details from these few.

And, in entering to table,
If he who says to thee "Go in" is a man of distinction,
On account of his dignity
It behoves thee not to dispute the going.

With thine equals, it besecms to decline
 For-awhile, and then to conform to their wish :
 With superiors, affect
 Just the least demur, and then acquiesce.

With inferiors, keep silence,
 And take the place which they give thee : and reflect
 That, by resisting here,
 Thou, by thy default, wouldst be making them rude.

In thine own house, remain
 Behind, if they are thy superiors or equals :
 And, if thine inferiors, thou shalt seem
 No other than correct if thou dost the same.

Understand the like, if thou givest
 To eat to any persons out of thine own home :
 Also remain behind when it happens
 That thou art entertaining women.

Next consider about placing
 Each person in the post that befits him.
 Between relatives it behoves
 To place others midway sometimes.

And, in this, honour the more
 Those who are strangers, and retain the others by thyself :
 And keep cheerful
 Thy face and demeanour, and forbear with all.

Now I speak for every one.
 He who is helping, let him help in equal portions.
 He who is helped, let him not manœuvre
 For the best, but take the less good.

They must not be pressed ;
 For this is their own affair, and choice is free,
 And one forces the preference
 Of him who was abstaining, perhaps purposely.

He makes a fool of himself who prematurely lays aside
 His plate, while the others are still eating ;
 And he who untidily
 Turns the table into a receptacle for scraps ;

And he who sneers
 At what he does not like ; and he who hurries ;
 And he who picks and chooses
 Out of the viands which are in common ;

And those who seem more hungry
 At the end than at the beginning ;

And also he who sets to
 At fortifying himself,<sup>1</sup> or exploring the bottom of the platter.
 Nor do I think it looks quite well
 To gnaw the bone with the teeth, and still worse
 To drop it into the saucepan ;<sup>2</sup>
 Nor is salt well deposited on the dish.

And I think that he does amiss
 Who carves, being at the table of his superior ;
 For none can perform service
 If he does not first ask leave.

With thine equal, begin,
 If the knife lies at thy right hand :
 If not, leave it to him.
 With fruit, thou canst not fitly help thy companion.

With women, I need not tell thee :
 But thou must help them to everything,
 If there is not some one who undertakes
 Both the carving and other details.

But always look to it
 That thou approach not too close to any of them.
 And, if one of them is a relative of thine,
 Thou wilt give more room to the other.

And, in short, thou wilt then
 Do and render honour to thine utmost :
 And here always mind
 That thou soil not their dress.

Look them in the face but little,
 Still less at their hands while eating,
 For they are apt to be bashful :
 And with respect to them, thou mayst well say " Do eat."

When sometimes there come
 Dishes or fruits, I praise him who thinks of avoiding
 To take of those
 Which cannot with cleanliness be handled.

Ill does the hand which hurries
 To take a larger help out of a dish in common ;
 And worse he who does not well avoid
 To loll, or set leg upon leg.

<sup>1</sup> 'Chi vuol fare merli.' The phrase means literally 'he who wants to make battlements'—or possibly 'to make thrushes.' I can only guess at its bearing in the present passage, having searched for a distinct explanation in vain. It seems to be one of the myriad 'vezzi di lingua' of old Italian, and especially old Tuscan, idiom.

<sup>2</sup> 'Di mandar a lavaggio.' I am far from certain as to the real meaning.

And be it observed
That here thou shouldst speak little and briefly :
Nor here must there be speech
Of aught save elegant and cheerful pleasantness.

I have shown thee above
Concerning the respect due to [thy lord], and saluting him.
I will now tell thee
More than I before said concerning service.

Take care that, in every operation
Or service that thou dost before him,
Thou must think steadily
Of what thou art about, for it goes ill if thou art absent-minded.

Thou shouldst keep thine eye,
When thou servest him, on that which he likes.
The silent tongue is aright,
Always without questioning, during service ;

Also that thou keep thyself,
Thou who hast to serve, clean in dress and hands.
And I would have thee also serve strangers,
If they are at the meal with him.

Likewise have an eye to it
That thou keep things clean before him thou servest.
And thou dost well if thou keepest
The slice entire, if thou canst, in carving ;

And amiss if neglectfully
Thou makest too great a lump of the carved viands ;
And worse if thou art so long about it
That they have nothing to eat.

And, when there may be Viands which make the hands uncleanly,
In some unobtrusive way
Get them washed by the time the next come on.

Thou shalt always be observant of the same
In bringing forward the fruits :
For to offer these about,
As I said before, befits not the guests.

Also I much complain
Of thee who wouldst then be correcting others :
For the present it must suffice thee,
In this case, to do right for thyself only.

He puts me out who has
So awkward a manner in cutting

That, in peeling a pear,
 He takes up from three to nine o'clock ;
 And also he who keeps not good guard
 Over his hand, and slips in cutting ;
 For he is prevented from serving,
 And his lord sometimes has no one to serve him.

I dislike that he who serves
 Should, in serving, speak of the doctor ;
 Unless maybe by way of obeying,
 When he has it in command from him.

In giving water thou shalt be careful,
 Considering the time and place :
 Where there is little, little ;
 In the cold time, less cold—and, if very cold, warm.

When the sun is very hot,
 Bring it abundantly, but mind the people's clothes.
 Observe the station and the ages,
 With regard to whom thou shalt begin with, if there is none to tell thee.<sup>1</sup>

At table it behoves
 Not to give bad or offensive news ;
 Unless delay might produce
 Danger—and then only to the person concerned.

Be thy mouth abstinent
 From eating while the first table is set.
 In drinking do likewise.
 So far as gratification goes, but thirst excuses thee :

Which if thou feelest, accustom thyself
 Not to drink underhand, nor of the best.
 Neither is a servant liked
 Who afterwards is long over his eating,

If he is where he can do this ;
 And still less he who sulks if he is called
 When he has not yet done eating ;
 For he serves best who serves other than his gullet.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> This precept, and especially a preceding one (p. 39) which enjoins the host to place the guests in their appropriate seats, keeping by himself those of less account, would seem to show that at this period the seats at the right and left of the host (or hostess) were by no means understood to be posts of honour. The absence of all mention, either in Bonvieino or in Barberino, of the hostess or her especial duties, strikes one as a singularity. That the hostess is nevertheless understood to be present may be fairly inferred from the clearly expressed presence of other ladies.

Before parting from the Documenti d'Amore, I will summarize a few more of Barberino's dicta on points of courtesy and demeanour in general.

There are seven offences in speaking: 1. Prolixity; 2. Curtness; 3. Audacity; 4. Mauvaise Honte; 5. Stuttering; 6. Beating about the bush; 7. Restlessness of gesture, and this is the least supportable of all. Remedies against all these evils are assigned. For the 6th, as we are told, the (then) modern usage is to speak out what you have to say with little or no proem. As to the 7th, the moving about, as a child would do, the hands, feet, or head, or the using action in speech, shows deficient firmness. See that you stand firm. Yet all this is to be modified according to place, time, and the auditory. (It is amusing to find the dignified Tuscan of the thirteenth to fourteenth century reprobating that luxuriance of gesture which is one of the first things to strike an English eye in Italy down to our own day—more especially in the southern parts of the country. To have striven to obey Barberino's precept, under pain of being pronounced bad company, must have proved hard lines to some of his contemporaries and catechumens.)

If you chance into uncongenial company, take the first opportune occasion for getting away, with some parting words that shall not bewray your antipathy.

To casual companions speak on their own respective subjects; as of God to the clergy, health to doctors, design to painters. 'With ladies of refinement and breeding, laud and uphold their honour and state by pleasant stories not oftentimes told already. And, if any one is contrary and froward, reply in excuse and defence; for it is derogatory to contend against those the overcoming of whom is loss.'

If you come into the company of a great lord, or of persons who are all your superiors, and if they invite you to speak, inquire what the topic shall be. If you find nothing to say, wait for some one else to start you; and at worst be silent. In such company, be there no gesturing (again!).

If you are walking with a great lord in any country, conform in a measure to the usages there prevalent.

Following your superior, be respectful; to your equal, complaisant, and treat him as superior; and, even with your inferior, tend towards the same line of conduct. This, however, does not apply to your own servant. Better exceed than fall short in showing respect to unknown persons. If your superior, in walking with you, wants to have you by his side, go to his left as a general rule, so that he may have the full use of his sword hand. If it rains, and he has no cloak, offer him yours; and, even if he declines, you must still dispense with it yourself. The like with your hat. Pay similar attentions to your equal, or to one that is a little your inferior: and even to your positive inferiors you must rather overdo courtesy than fall short. Thus also with women: you must explore the way for them, and attend on them, and in danger defend them with your life.

In church, do not pray aloud, but silently.

Wait not to be saluted. Be first in saluting; but do not overdo this, and never reiterate a salutation. Your own lord you must not salute, unless he comes from afar. You should uncover to him: then, if he is covered, cover again. Do not exceed in saluting an intimate, but enter at once into conversation; and do not hug him, unless he and you are indeed one.<sup>1</sup> Bow to ladies without much speaking: and in towns ascertain the ordinary practice in such cases, and observe it. If you see a female relative in your own town, she being alone, or in company with only one person, and if she is handsome, accost her as though she were not your relative, unless your relationship is a fact known to the bystanders. (This is a master-touch: and here is another, of a nearly similar sort)—

In serving a man of distinction, if you meet his wife, affect not to observe her; and, if she gives you any commission to fulfil, don't show that it gratifies you.

The 16th 'Documento' sets forth 'the method of making presents so that the gift be acceptable.' It is so admirable in point of both sense and expression that I quote the original in a note, secure that that will be a gift acceptable to all such readers of these pages

<sup>1</sup> Prettily worded in the Italian:

'Nè abbracciar stringendo,
Se non sei ben una cosa con quello.'

as may be readers of Italian also.<sup>1</sup> What can be more perfect than the censure awarded to those who are in a chafe until, by reciprocating any service rendered to them, they shall have wiped it out?

‘Be all aware
That it is no small flaw to mislike
Remaining under an obligation :
Nay, it then seems that one is liberal by compulsion.’

Barberino's second work, Del Reggimento e dei Costumi delle Donne, furnishes, strange to say, hardly any express rules for conduct at table ; but some details may, for our general purpose, be picked out of an emporium whose abundance can be surmised from the following programme.

<sup>1</sup> Ancor c' è molta gente
Ch' han certi vizj in dono ed in servire,
Sì che poco gradire
Vediamo in lor quando ne fanno altrui :
Chè non pensano a cui,
Nè che nè come, nè tanto nè quanto.
Altri fanno un procanto
Di sue bisogne, e poi pur fanno il dono.
Ed altri certi sono
Che danno indugio, e credon far maggiore.
E molti che colore
Pongon a scusa, e poi pur fanno e danno.
Ed altri che, com' hanno
Servigio ricevuto, affrettan troppo
Disobbligar lo groppo
Col qual eran legati alli serventi :
Onde sien tutti attenti
Che non è picciol vizio non volere
Obbligato manere ;
Anzi par poi che sforzato sia largo.
Dicemi alcuno : ‘Io spargo
Li don, per mia libertate tenere ;
Non per altrui piacere.’
Questo è gran vizio : ed è virtù maggiore,
E più porta d'onore,
Saver donar la sua persona altrui,
Ricevendo da lui,
E star apparecchiato a meritare.
E non ti vo' lassare
Lo vizio di colui che colla faccia
Non vuol dar sì che piaccia,
Ma turba tutto, e sta gran pezza mutto.

' I will divide this work into 20 parts :
 And each part
 Shall present certain distinct grades,
 As the foregoing reading shows.
 The 1st will relate how a girl
 Should conduct herself
 When she begins to appreciate right and wrong,
 And to fear shame.
 2nd, How, when
 She comes to a marriageable age.
 3rd, How, when she has passed
 The period for marriage.
 4th, if, after she has given up the hope of ever
 Obtaining a husband, it happens
 That yet she gets one, and remains
 At home awhile before going to him.
 The 5th, How, after she is married ;
 And how the first, and how
 The second and third,
 Up to fifteen days ; and the first month,
 And the second and third ;
 And how on to her end :
 Both before having children, and afterwards, and if she
 Has none : and how in old age.
 The 6th, How, if she loses her husband :
 And how if she is old ;
 And how if she is of middle age ;
 And how if she is left young ;
 And how if she has children ;
 And how if she is a grandmother ;
 And how if she still Remains mistress of her husband's property ;
 And if she, being a widow, takes
 The garb of religion.
 The 7th sets forth
 How she should comport herself
 If she marries again ;
 And how if to a better [husband],
 And how if to a worse
 And less wealthy one ;
 And how if she yet goes to a third ;
 And how, after she has become a widow,
 And has again taken a husband,
 She remains awhile at home
 Before going to him ;
 And how far re-marrying is praised or blamed.
 8th, How, she

Who assumes the habit
 Of a religious order at home ;
 And how this is praised or no.
 9th, How, being shut up in a monastery
 In perpetual reclusion ;
 And how the Abbess, Superior, and Prioress,
 And every other Portress or Nun.
 10th, How she
 Who secludes herself alone
 Is named a Hermitess ; and wherein this is to blame.
 11th, How
 The maid who is
 In companionship with a lady ;
 And how if she is alone,
 And how if one among others in the like office.
 12th, How
 Every serving-woman shall conduct herself,
 Whether serving a lady alone, or a lady along
 With the master ; and also if any, by herself, Serves a master ; and how
 This is to be praised, and how not.
 13th, How,
 A nurse in the house, and how apart.
 14th, How,
 The female serf or slave ;<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The mention of a slave in a Florentine household of the late 13th or early 14th century may startle some readers. I translate the note which Signor Guglielmo Manzi, the editor of the Reggimento, supplies on this subject. 'Slavery, which abases mankind, and revolts humanity and reason, diminished greatly when the Christian religion was introduced into the Roman Empire—that religion being in manifest opposition to so barbarous a system. The more the one progressed in the world, the more did the other wane ; and, as Bodino observes in his book De Republicâ, slavery had ceased in Europe, to a great extent, by 1200. I shall follow this author, who is the only one to afford us some degree of light amid so great obscurity. In the year 1212 there were still, according to him, slaves in Italy ; as may be seen from the ordinances of William, King of Sicily, and of the Emperor Frederick II. for the kingdom of Naples, and from the decretals of the Popes Alexander III., Urban III., and Innocent III., concerning the marriages of slaves. The first of these Popes was elected in 1158, the second in 1185, and the third in 1198 ; so that the principle of liberty cannot be dated earlier than in or about 1250—Bartolo, who lived in the year 1300, writing (Hostes de Captivis, I.) that in his time there were no slaves, and that, according to the laws of Christendom, men were no longer put up to sale. This assertion, however, conflicts with the words of our author, who affirms that in his time—that is, at the commencement of the 14th century—the custom existed. But, in elucidation of Bartolo, it should be said that he implied that men were no longer sold, on the ground that this was prohibited by the laws of Christendom, and the edicts of sovereigns. In France it can be shown that in 1430 Charles VII. gave their

And how, being a serf,
She may afterwards, through her conduct, obtain her liberty.

15th, How

Every kind of woman
Of the common sort should behave,
And of a lower and poorer sort ; and all
Save the bad ones of dissolute life
Who sell their honour for money,—
Whom I do not purpose
To put in writing,
Nor to make any mention of them,
For they are not worthy to be named.

16th treats

Of certain general precepts
To all women ; and of their ornaments,
And their adventures.

17th, of their consolations.

18th, because sometimes

They must know how to speak and converse
And answer, and be in company,
Here will be treated upon questions of love
And courtesy and breeding.

19th treats

Of certain motetts and messages<sup>1</sup>
Of ladies to knights,
And of other sorts
Of women and men.

The 20th treats

Of certain orisons.
And in this part is the conclusion
Of the book ; and how I carry this book
To the Lady who is above-named,<sup>2</sup> liberty to some persons of servile condition ; and even in the year 1548 King Henri II. liberated, by letters patent, those of the Bourbonnais : and the like was done throughout all his states by the Duke of Savoy in 1561. In the Hundred Tales of Boccaccio we have also various instances showing that the sale of free men was practised in Italy. These are in the 6th Tale of the 2nd Day, the story of Madonna Beritola, whose sons remained in Genoa in serfdom ; and in the 6th of the 5th Day, the story of Frederick, King of Sicily ; and in the 7th of the same Day, the story of Theodore and Violante. It is therefore clear, from all this evidence, that, in the time of Messer Francesco, so execrable a practice was still prevalent ; and, summing up all we have said, it must be concluded that serfdom, in non-barbarian Europe, was not entirely extinguished till the 16th century.

<sup>1</sup> 'Mottetti e parlari.' Only a few specimens of these are given, and they are all sufficiently occult. Here is one. 'Grande a morte, o la morte. Di molte se grava morte. [Responde Madonna] Dolci amorme, quel camorme, dunque amorme conveniarne.'

<sup>2</sup> This Lady is an ideal or symbolic personage—presumably Wisdom.

And how she receives it;
 And how the Virtues
 Come before her.'

The promise here is rich indeed, and the performance also is rich; though it may fairly be said that various sections fall considerably below one's expectations, and some of them are jejune enough. But, after every deduction has been made, the work fills a niche of its own, and without competitor.

I add a few of the details most germane to our purpose.

A young girl should drink but little, and that diluted. She must not loll at table, nor prop her arms thereon. Here she should speak even less than at other times. The daughters of Knights (Cavalier da Scudo), Judges, Physicians, or others of similar condition, had better learn the art of cooking, though possibly circumstances will not call upon them to put it in practice.

A Princess approaching the marriageable age should not go out to church; as she ought, as far as possible, to avoid being seen about. (The marriageable age, be it understood, is very early by Barberino's reckoning, being twelve years.) A woman should never go out alone.

An unmarried young lady had better wear a topaz, which is proved by experience to be an antidote to carnal desire.

A Provençal gentleman, who was praising his wife for her extreme simplicity in attire, was asked, 'Why then does she comb her hair?' He replied: 'To show that she is a woman, whose very nature it is to be trim in person.'

A Lady's-maid should not tell tales to her mistress of any peccadilloes of the husband: still less should she report to the husband anything against his wife, unless it be a grave and open misdoing.

The section concerning Nurses (Part 13) contains much curious matter: especially as showing how much reliance was placed upon swaddling and other details of infant management, for the improvement of good looks, and correction of blemishes. Here we find also that the system against which Rousseau waged such earnest war, of mothers' not suckling their own children, was already in full vigour in Barberino's time. He enters no protest against it; but does recommend mothers to follow the more natural plan, if they can, and so please God, and earn the children's love.<sup>1</sup>

A she-Barber must not ogle or flirt with her customers, but attend to her washes and razors. A Fruiteress must not put green leaves with old fruits, nor the best fruits uppermost, to take her customers in. A Landlady must not sell re-cooked victuals.

<sup>1</sup> Matteo Palmieri (see p. 58) indicates that the state of things was the same in his time, about 1430: he is more decided than Barberino in condemning it.

A shrew earns the stick sometimes ; nor should that form of correction be spared to women who gad about after fortune-tellers.

Beware of a Doctor who scrutinizes your pretty face more than your symptoms. Also of a Tailor who wants to serve you gratis, or who is over-officious in trying on your clothes : and beware still more of a Tailor who is tremulous. If you go to any balls where men are present, let it be by day, or at any rate with abundance of light.

The use of thick unguents is uncleanly, especially in hot weather ; it makes the teeth black, the lips green, and the skin prematurely old-looking. Baths of soft water, not in excess, keep the skin young and fresh : but those in which hot herbs are boiled scorch and blacken it. Dark hair becomes lighter by being kept uncovered, especially in moonlight.

‘Courtesy is liberal magnificence, which suffers not violence, nor ingenuity, nor obligation, but pleases of itself alone.’

To these brief jottings I subjoin one extract of some length, descriptive of the marriage-festivity of a Queen. To abridge its details would be to strip it of its value : but I apprehend that some of these details require to be taken cum grano salis, Barberino having allowed himself a certain poetical license.

Now it behoves to dine.
 The trumpets sound, and all the instruments,
 Sweet songs and diversions around.
 Boughs, with flowers, tapestries, and satins,
 Strewn on the ground ; and great lengths of silk
 With fine fringes and broiderings on the walls.
 Silver and gold, and the tables set out,
 Covered couches, and the joyous chambers,
 Full kitchens and various dishes ;
 Donzels deft in serving,
 And among them damsels still more so.
 Tourneying in the cloisters and pathways ;
 Closed balconies and covered loggias ;
 Many cavaliers and people of worth,
 Ladies and damsels of great beauty.
 Old women hidden in prayer to God,
 Be they served there where they stay.
 Wines come in, and abundant comfits ;
 There are the fruits of various kinds.
 The birds sing in cages, and on the roofs :
 The stags leap, and fawns, and deer.
 Open gardens, and their scent spreads.
 There greyhounds and braches run in the leash.
 Pretty spaniel pets with the ladies :

Several parrots go about the tables.
 Falcons, ger-falcons, hawks, and sparrow-hawks,
 Carry various snakes all about.
 The palfreys houselled at the doors ;
 The doors open, and the halls partitioned
 As suits the people that have come.
 Expert seneschals and other officers.
 Bread of manna only, and the weather splendid.
 Fountains rise up from new springs :
 They sprinkle where they are wanted, and are beautiful.

The trumpet sounds, and the bridegroom with his following
 Chooses his company as he likes.
 Ladies amorous, joyous, and lovely,
 Trained, and noble, and of like age,
 Take the bride, and usher her as befits :
 They give her place to sit at table.
 Now damsels and donzels around,
 The many ladies who have taken their seats,
 All prattle of love and joy.

A gentle wind which keeps off the flies
 Tempers the air, and refreshes hearts.
 From the sun spring laughs in the fields :
 Nowhere can the eye settle.
 At your foot run delightful rills :
 At times the fish leap from the water.
 Jongleurs<sup>1</sup> clad by gift :
 Here vestments of fashion unprecedented,
 There with pearls and precious stones
 Upon their heads, and solemn garb :
 Here are rings which emit a splendour
 Like that of the sun outside.
 Now all the men and all the ladies have washed,
 And then the water is given to the bride :
 And I resume speaking of her deportment.
 Let her have washed her hands aforetime,
 So that she may then not greatly bedim the water.
 Let her not much set-to at washing in the basin,
 Nor touch mouth or teeth in washing :

<sup>1</sup> 'Uomin di corte.' This term was first applied to heralds, chamberlains, and the like court-officials: subsequently to the entertainers of a court, 'giullari,' jesters, and buffoons: and in process of time it came to include courtiers of whatever class. In the early writers—such as Barberino, Boccaccio, &c.—it is not always easy for a translator to pitch upon the precise equivalent: the reader should understand a personage who might be as romantic as a Troubadour, or as quaint as a Touchstone—but tending rather towards the latter extreme.

For she can do this afterwards in her chamber,
 When it shall be needful and fitting.
 Of the savoury and nicest viands
 Let her accept, but little, and avoid eating many :
 And let her, several days before, have noted
 The other customs above written ;
 Here let her observe those which beseeem the place.
 Let her not intervene to reprehend the servitors,
 Nor yet speak, unless occasion requires.
 Let it appear that she hardly minds any diversion,
 But that only timidity quenches her pleasure :
 But let her, in eating, so manage her hands
 That, in washing, the clear water may remain.
 The table being removed, let her stay with the ladies
 Somewhat more freely than at her arrival :
 Yet for this day let her, I pray,
 Abstain from laughing as far as she can, keeping
 Her countenance so as not to appear out of humour,
 But only timid, as has often been said.
 If the other ladies sleep that day,
 Let her also repose among them,
 And prepare herself the better for keeping awake.
 Let her drinking be small. I approve a light collation,
 Eating little : and in like wise at supper
 Let her avoid too many comfits or fruits :
 Let her make it rather slight than heavy.

Some ladies make ready to go,
 And some others to retire to their chambers.
 Those remain who are in charge of her :
 All approach to cheer her.
 She embraces her intimates :
 Let her make the kindest demonstrations to all—
 'Adieu, adieu'—tearful at parting.
 They all cheer her up, and beg her to be Confident, and many vouch
 That her husband has gone to a distance :
 Her guardians say the same.
 They bring her inwards to a new chamber,
 Whose walls are so draped
 That nothing is seen save silk and gold ;
 The coverlets starred, and with moons.
 The stones shine as it were the sun :
 At the corners four rubies lift up a flame
 So lovely that it touches the heart :
 Here a man kindles inside and out.
 Richest cambrics cover the floor.

Here baldaquins and the benches around
 All covered with woven pearls ;
 Pillows all of smooth samite,
 With the down of griffin-birds<sup>1</sup> inside ;
 Many topazes, sapphires, and emeralds,
 With various stones, as buttons to these.
 Beds loaded on beds with no bedstead,
 Draped all with foreign cloths :<sup>2</sup>
 Above the others the chiefest and soft,
 With a new covering of byssus.<sup>3</sup>
 Of this the down is from the phoenix-bird :<sup>4</sup>
 It has one bolster and no more,
 Not too large, but of fine form,
 Over it sheets of worked silk,
 Soft, yielding, delicate, and durable :
 A superb quilt, and cuttings-out<sup>5</sup> within ;
 And, traced with the needle and of various cutting,
 Fishes and birds and all animals.
 A vine goes round the whole,
 The twigs of pearls, and the foliage of gems,
 Among which are those of all virtues,
 Written of or named as excellent.
 In the midst of it turns a wheel
 Which represents the figure of the world ;
 Wherein birds, in windows of glass,
 Sing if you will, and if not they are all mute.
 There puppies of various kinds,
 Not troublesome, and they make no noise :
 If you call them, they make much of you.
 On the benches flowers heaped and strewn—
 Great is the odour, but not excessive :
 Much balsam in vessels of crystal.

<sup>1</sup> 'Ucelli grifoni.' This seems a daring suggestion : possibly, as a griffin is a compound of eagle and lion, we are to understand that the eagle is the griffin-bird.

<sup>2</sup> 'Drappi oltramarin'—which may mean foreign (from beyond sea), or else of ultramarine colour : I rather suppose the former.

<sup>3</sup> 'Lana di pesce'—literally, fish's wool. The term is new to me, nor do I find it explained in dictionaries : I can only therefore surmise that it designates the silky filaments of certain sea-mollusks, such as the pinna of the Mediterranean. This byssus is still made use of in Italy for gloves and similar articles.

<sup>4</sup> !!

<sup>5</sup> 'Intaglj ;' and the next line gives the word 'Scolture. Giovanni Villani notes that in 1330 a prohibition was issued against 'dresses cut-out or painted :' the fashion having run into the extravagance of 'dresses cut-out with different sorts of cloth, and made of stuffs trimmed variously with silks.'

A nurse says : 'All things are yours.
 You will lie by yourself in that bed :
 We will all be sleeping here.'
 They show her the wardrobe at one side,
 Wherein they say that they remain keeping watch.
 They wash the Lady's face and hands
 With rose-water mixed with violets,
 For in that country such is the wont.
 They dress her hair, wind up her tresses,
 Stand round about her, help her to disrobe.
 Who takes her shoes off, happy she !
 Her shoes are by no means of leather.
 They look her in the face whether she is timorous :
 She prays them to stay.
 They tell her that they will sleep outside the bed,
 At her feet, on the cloths I have spoken of.
 They make-believe to do so, and the Lady smiles.
 They put her to bed : first they hold her,—
 They turn the quilt over : and, her face being displayed,
 All the shows of gems and draperies
 Wane before that amorous beauty
 Which issues from the eyes she turns around.
 Her visage shines : the nurses disappear :
 The Lady closes her eyes, and sleeps.

Then these nurses trick the Lady.
 They leave by the door which they had not shown her :
 They go to the bridegroom who is waiting outside.
 Him they tell of the trick.
 There come around the new knight,
 Young lord, puissant crown,
 Many donzels and knights who wait
 Solely for his chamber-service.
 They give him water, as to the Lady :
 His blond head each adorns,
 Bright his countenance. Every one
 Has gladness and joy, glad in his happiness.
 They leave him in his jerkin, they bring him within :
 They take off his shoes at the draped entry.
 They all without, and the nurses at one side,
 Stay quiet. A réveillée begins,
 And so far off that it gives no annoy.

The comely King crosses himself, and looks :
 The Lady and the gems make a great splendour,
 And it seems to him that this Queen is asleop.
 He enters softly, and wholly undresses :
 It appears that the Lady heaves a sigh.

The King is scared : he covers himself up in the bed.
 He signals to the birds to sing :
 They all begin, one by one, and low.<sup>1</sup>
 The signal tells them to raise their note :
 Higher they rise in singing—and perchance
 This noise may wake the Lady up.
 Again he signals that they should all trill louder.

The Lady heaves a sigh, and asks,
 'Who is there?'—Says the King : 'I am one
 Whom thy beauties have brought hither.'
 She is troubled, and calls the nurses.
 The King replies : 'I have turned them all out.
 She moves, wanting to get up :
 She finds no clothes, for they have carried them away.
 The King remains quiet, and waits to see
 In what way he may be able to please her,
 And says to her : 'I have only come hither
 To speak to thee a few words :
 Listen a little, and then I will go.'

An elaborate dialogue ensues, conducted on the most high-paced footing of enamoured courtesies. It contains the strangely beautiful passage translated in my brother's Early Italian Poets, and which I reproduce here ; taking therewith my leave both of this singular specimen of how Kings and Queens might, would, could, or should confer on their bridal-night, and also of Francesco da Barberino himself. The Queen is the speaker.

'Do not conceive that I shall here recount
 All my own beauty : yet I promise you
 That you, by what I tell, shall understand
 All that befits and that is well to know.
 My bosom, which is very softly made,
 Of a white even colour without stain,
 Bears two fair apples, fragrant, sweetly savoured,
 Gathered together from the Tree of Life
 The which is in the midst of Paradise.
 And these no person ever yet has touched ;
 For out of nurse's and of mother's hands
 I was when God in secret gave them me.

<sup>1</sup> These seem to be very obedient birds : and their position, behind glass windows in a globe figuring the world, was rather an odd one to modern notions. The reader will keep me company in guessing whether or not we are to take the whole description au pied de la lettre.

These ere I yield I must know well to whom ;
 And, for that I would not be robbed of them,
 I speak not all the virtue that they have :
 Yet thus far speaking— Blessed were the man
 Who once should touch them, were it but a little :
 See them I say not, for that might not be.
 My girdle, clipping pleasure round-about,
 Over my clear dress even unto my knees
 Hangs down with sweet precision tenderly ;
 And under it Virginitie abides.
 Faithful and simple and of plain belief
 She is, with her fair garland bright like gold,
 And very fearful if she overhears
 Speech of herself ; the wherefore ye perceive
 That I speak soft lest she be made ashamed.
 Lo ! this is she who hath for company
 The Son of God, and Mother of the Son.
 Lo ! this is she who sits with many in heaven :
 Lo ! this is she with whom are few on earth.'

Tiraboschi mentions a book which might perhaps be useful in further illustrating Italian manners at the end of the 13th century : but I have no direct knowledge of it,—a Treatise on the Governing of a Family, written by Sandro di Pippo in 1299. A treatise on Moral Virtues (Sopra le Virtù Morali) was composed by Graziolo de' Bombaglioli, a Bolognese, in Italian verse, with a comment in Latin, the date being about the middle of the 14th century ; and was published in 1642, being at that time mistakenly attributed to King Robert of Naples. It is not a Courtesy-Book ; but, referring back to what has been said (on p. 12) regarding the definitions of nobility given by Brunetto Latini, Dante, and Barberino, I may cite part of what Bombaglioli says on the same subject :

' Neither long-standing wealth nor blood confers nobility ;
 But virtue makes a man noble (gentile) ;
 And it lifts from a vile place
 A man who makes himself lofty by his goodness.'

A third and older book, no doubt very much to our purpose, would be one which Ubaldini (in his edition of Barberino's Reggimento) refers to as having been laid under contribution by that poet in compiling his Documenti d'Amore—viz. a rhymed composition, in the Romagnole dialect, on Methods of Salutation, by Ugolino Brucola

(or Bruzola). This work, again, is unknown to me; and, as I can trace no mention of it even in Tiraboschi, a writer of most omnivorous digestion, I infer that it may not improbably have perished.

Skipping therefore about a century and a quarter, within which Italian literature was made for ever illustrious by the Commedia of Dante, and the writings of Petrarca and Boccaccio, not to speak of others, we come to the early 15th century, still in Florence.

Agnolo Pandolfini wrote on the same subject as Sandro di Pippozzo, the Governing of a Family (Del Governo della Famiglia). He died in 1446, aged about 86; and the date of his treatise seems to be towards 1425—30. This work must not be confounded with one bearing the same title, frequently cited in the Dizionario della Crusca, and which deals more particularly with morals and religion. Pandolfini, both by birth and doings, was a very illustrious son of Florence: in 1414, 1420, and 1431, he held the highest dignity of the state, that of Gonfalonier of Justice. He opposed the banishment of Cosmo de' Medici, and was treated with distinguished honour by that great though dangerous citizen on his return. His treatise takes the form of a dialogue, wherein Agnolo holds forth ore rotundo to his sons and grandsons. The old gentleman is indeed fearfully oracular, and possessed with a fathomless belief in himself. He writes well, and with plenty of good sense. His book is not, in the strictest acceptation of the term, a Courtesy-Book, but rather a cross between the moral and the prudential—a dissertation of Economics. Here are some samples of his lore.

To choose a house wherein one can settle comfortably for life is a great consideration. A locality with good air and good wine should be sought out: better to buy it than to rent it. The whole family should have one roof, one entrance-door, one fire, and one dining-table: this subserves the purposes both of affection and of thrift.

The family and household should be well dressed. Even when living a country life, they should keep on the town dress: good cloth and cheerful colours, but without fancy-ornaments save for the women.

The head of the family should commit to his wife the immediate care of the household goods: men, however careful, should not be poking and prying into every corner, and looking whether the candles have too thick a wick. 'It is well for every lady to know how to cook, and prepare all choice viands ; to learn this from cooks when they come to the house for banquets ; to see them at work, ask questions, learn, and bear in mind, so that, when guests come who ought to be received with welcome, the ladies may know and order all the best things—and so not have to send every time for cooks. This cannot be done at a moment's notice, and especially when one is in the country, where good cooks are not to be had, and strangers are more in the way of being asked. Not indeed that the lady is to cook ; but she should order, teach, and show the less skilful servants to do everything in the best way, and make the best dishes suitable to the season and the guests.'

' I [the infallible Agnolo Pandolfini] always liked so to order the household that, at whatever hour of day or night, there should always be some one at home to look after all casualties that might happen to the inmates. And I always kept in the house a goose and a dog—wakeful animals, and, as we see, suspicious and attached ; so that, one of them rousing the other, and calling up the household, the house might always be secure.'

Always buy of the best—food, clothes, &c., &c. ' Good things cost less than the not good.'

That Agnolo Pandolfini was regarded as a great authority not by himself alone is proved by the fact that Matteo Palmieri, the author of a Dialogue on Civil Life (Della Vita Civile), makes him the principal speaker. And this was perhaps even during Agnolo's lifetime : the assumed date of the colloquy being 1430 (very much the same as that of Pandolfini's own book), and the actual date of composition being probably enough not many years later. Palmieri was born in Florence in 1405, and died in 1475, honoured for conspicuous integrity, and distinguished by many public employments. The Vita Civile is regarded as his most important literary work. The interlocutors, besides Pandolfini, are a Sacchetti and a Guicciardini. The subject-matter is more grave and weighty than that of a Courtesy-Book strictly so called, though we may dip into it for a detail or two. The following is Palmieri's own account of the work :

' The whole performance is divided into four books. In the 1st the new-born boy is diligently conducted up to the perfect age of man ; showing by what nurture and according to what arts he should prove more excellent than others. The following two books are written concerning Uprightness ; and express in what manner the man of perfect age should act, in private and in public, according to every moral virtue. Whence, in the former of these, Temperance,

Fortitude, and Prudence, are treated of at large—also other virtues comprised in these. The next is 3rd in order, and is all devoted to Justice, which is the noblest part of men, and above all others necessary for maintaining every well-ordered commonwealth. Wherefore here is diffusely treated of Civil Justice; how people should conduct themselves in peace; and how wars are managed; how, within the city by those who hold the magistracies, and beyond the walls by the public officials, the general well-being is provided for. The last book alone is written concerning Utility, and provides for the plenty, ornament, property, and abundant riches, of the whole body politic. Then in the final portion, as last conclusion, is shown, not without true doctrine, what is the state of the souls which in the world, intent upon public good, have lived according to the precepts of life here set forth by us; in reward whereof they have been by God received into heaven, to be happy eternally in glory with his saints.'

Palmieri would have boys eschew any sedentary pastimes. They may jump, run, and play at ball; and music is highly suitable for them. To beat them is a barbarism. This may indeed, sometimes and perhaps, be necessary with boys 'who are to follow mechanical and servile arts,' but not with those who are carefully brought up by father and preceptor. Begin with encouragements to the well-behaved, and admonitions to the naughty: and the severer punishments should be 'to shut him in; to withhold such food and other things as he best likes, to take away his clothing, and so on; to make him ponder long while over his misdoing.' (This is singularly gentle discipline for A.D. 1430: indeed Palmieri intimates that 'almost all people' advocated manual correction in his time. Had any other writer, of so early a date, discovered that 'spare the rod and spoil the child' is not the sum-total of management for minors?)

A dinner-party is considered well made up, in point of numbers, if the persons present are not less than three, nor more than nine. A larger number than the latter cannot all join together in united conversation.

'The expenses of a munificent man should be in things that bring honour and distinction; not private, but public—as in buildings, and ornaments of churches, theatres, loggias, public feasts, games, entertainments; and in such like magnificences he should not compute nor reckon how much he spends, but by what means the works may be to the utmost wonderful and beautiful.' (Nice doctrine this for some of our conscript fathers in England, whose perennial diligence is, as Carlyle says, 'preserving their game.' But the Florentine Republic was in that outcast condition that the noblemen were not only not hereditary legislators, but were ipso facto excluded from all public employment, unless they enrolled themselves in the commonalty by belonging to one of the legislating guilds.)

Both Pandolfini and Palmieri are authors of good repute in Italian literature : but by no means equal to the writer next on our list, Baldassar Castiglione, with his book named The Courtier (Il Cortigiano). This is a remarkably choice example of Italian prose ; which is the more satisfactory because Castiglione was not a Tuscan, but a Mantuan, and a proclaimed enemy of that narrow literary creed, the palladium of pedants and ever-recurring bane of strong individualism among Italian writers, that, save in the Florentine-Tuscan language (or dialect) of the ' buon secolo,' the days of Petrarca and Boccaccio, there is no orthodoxy of diction. Some noticeable details on this point are to be found in the Cortigiano : showing that the ultra-purists of that time insisted upon the use by writers, whether Tuscan or belonging to other parts of Italy, of words occurring in Petrarca and Boccaccio already quite obsolete and hardly intelligible even in Tuscany—and also upon the use of corrupt forms of words framed from the Latin, because these pertained to the Tuscan idiom, even although correct forms of the same words were in current use in other Italian regions. In all such regards Castiglione claims for himself unfettered latitude of choice : the verbal precisian, scared at his theoretic license, is surprised and relieved to find that after all the book is not only endurable in style, even to his own punctilious ears, but particularly elegant.

Baldassar Castiglione was born on the 6th of December 1478<sup>1</sup> at Casatico, in the Mantuan territory. Noble and handsome, he grew up almost universally accomplished and learned ; a distinguished connoisseur ; and valued by all the most eminent men of his time. His full-length portrait appears in one of the frescoes of

<sup>1</sup> Tiraboschi says 1468 ; but that, as far as I can trace, is a mistake.

Raphael in the Stanze of the Vatican. He went on many embassies—among others, to England. Henry VIII., of whose youthful promise he speaks in the most rapturous terms, knighted him: the Emperor Charles V. said that by Castiglione's death chivalry lost its brightest luminary. His career closed at Toledo on the 2nd of February 1529. Among his writings are poems in Latin and Italian, but his chief work is the Cortigiano. This was composed between the years 1508 and 1518; and published in 1528, in a state which its author regarded as somewhat hurried and incomplete. It is written in the narrative form, but consisting principally of dialogue, or indeed of successive monologues; and purports to relate certain conversazioni (rightly to be so called) which were held in 1506 in the court of Urbino, for the delectation of the Duchess Elisabetta della Rovere (by birth a Gonzaga) and her ladies. The topic proposed for treatment is—what should a perfectly qualified Courtier be like? The principal speakers on the general subject are the Conte Lodovico da Canossa, Federico Fregoso, and Ottavian Fregoso; Bernardo Bibiena takes up the special question of facetie, and Giuliano de' Medici speaks of the Court Lady, and generally in honour of women.

The term Courtier has not a very exalted sound to a modern or English ear: but Castiglione's ideal Courtier is a truly noble and gallant gentleman, furnished with all sorts of solid no less than splendid qualities. His ultimate raison d'être is that he should always, through good and evil report, tell his sovereign the strict truth of all things which it behoves him to know—certainly a sufficiently honourable and handsomely unfulfilled duty. The tone throughout is lofty, and of more than conventional or courtly rectitude:<sup>1</sup> indeed, the book as a whole is hardly what one associates mentally with the era of Pagan Popes,—of a Caesar Borgia just cleared off from Romagna, and an Alessandro de' Medici impending over Florence.

<sup>1</sup> It may be fair to state that the work, as first published, was put in the Roman index of prohibited books; and that the reissues (including no doubt the edition known to me) have omitted the inculpatèd passages. Whether these were objected to on moral or rather on ecclesiastical grounds I cannot affirm: the book as now printed is not only quite free from immoralities, but is decidedly moral, whereas there remains at least one passage of a tone such as churchmen resent ex officio.

Almost the only illustration which Castiglione supplies of the art of dining is the following anecdote :

‘The Marquis Federico of Mantua, father of our Lady Duchess, being at table with many gentlemen, one of them, after he had eaten a whole stew, said, “My Lord Marquis, pardon me ;” and, so saying, he began to suck up the broth that was left. Forthwith then said the Marquis : “You should ask pardon of the pigs, for to me there is no harm done at all !”’

Some other points I take as they come.

‘Having many a time reflected wherefrom Grace arises (not to speak of those who derive it from the stars), I find one most universal rule, which seems to me to hold good, in this regard, in all human things done and said, more than aught else ; and this is—to avoid affectation as much as one can, and as a most bristling and perilous rock, and (to use perhaps a new-coined word) to do everything with a certain slightingness [sprezzatura], which shall conceal art, and show that what is done and said comes to one without trouble and almost without thinking.’ Yet there may be as much affectation in slightingness itself as in punctilio. Instances adduced of the latter, as regards the care of the person, are the setting a scrap of looking-glass in a recess of one’s cap, and a comb in one’s sleeve, and keeping a page to follow one perpetually about with a sponge and a clothes-brush. Female affectations were ‘the plucking out the hair of eyebrows and forehead, and undergoing all those inconveniences which you ladies fancy to be altogether occult from men, and which nevertheless are all known.’

The perfect Courtier ought to know music—sing at sight, and play on various instruments ; he ought also to have a practical knowledge of drawing and painting. Better even than singing at sight is singing solo to the viol, and most especially thus singing in recitative [per recitare], ‘which adds to the words so much grace and force that great marvel it is.’ All stringed instruments are well suited for the Courtier ; not so wind-instruments, ‘which Minerva interdicted to Alcibiades, because they have an unseemly air.’ The Court Lady also ought to have knowledge of letters, music, and painting, as well as of dancing, and how to bear her part in entertainments [festeggiare].

‘Old men blame in us many things which, of themselves, are neither good nor bad, but only because they used not to do them : and they say that it is unbecoming for young men to go through the city riding, especially on mules ; to wear in the winter fur linings and long robes ; to wear a cap [berretta], at any rate until the man has reached eighteen years of age,—and other the like things. Wherein in sooth they mistake : for these customs, besides being convenient and serviceable, are introduced by fashion, and universally accepted,—as aforetime to dress in the open tunic [giornca], with open hose and polished shoes, and for gallantry to carry all day a hawk on the fist for no reason, and to dance without touching the lady's hand, and to adopt many other modes which, as they would now be most awkward, so then were they highly prized.'

Federico Fregoso, the chief speaker of the second evening, is of opinion that a man of rank ought not to honour with his presence a village feast, where the spectators and company would be coarse people. To this Gaspar Pallavicino demurs; saying that, in his native Lombardy, many young noblemen will dance all day under the sun with country people, and play with them at wrestling, running, leaping, and so on—exercises of strength and dexterity in which the countrymen are often the winners. Fregoso rejoins that this, if done at all, should be not by way of emulation but of complaisance, and when the nobleman feels tolerably sure of conquering; and generally, in all sorts of exercises save feats of arms, he should stop short of anything like professional zeal or excellence. [A concluding hint worth consideration in these days of 'Athletic Clubs.']

The discourse of Bernardo Bibiena on facetie is a magazine of good things, both anecdotic, epigrammatic, and critical. The speaker is particularly severe on 'funny men' and 'jolly dogs'; concerning whom I venture to introduce one consecutive extract of some little length.

'THE COURTIER should be very heedful of his beginnings, so as to leave a pleasing impression, and should consider how baneful and fatal it is to fall into the contrary. And this danger do they more than others run who make it their business to be amusing, and assume with these their quips a certain liberty authorizing and licensing them to do and say whatever strikes them, without any consideration. Thus these people start off on matters whence, not knowing their way out again, they try to help themselves off by raising a laugh: and this also they do so scurvily that it fails; so that they occasion the severest tedium to those who see and hear them, and they themselves remain most crestfallen. Sometimes, thinking thus to be witty and lively, in the presence of ladies of honour, and often even in speaking to them, they set to at uttering most nasty and indecent words: and, the more they see them blush, so much the more do they account themselves good courtiers: and ever and anon they laugh and plume themselves at so bright a gift which they think their own. But for no purpose do they commit so many imbecilities as in order to be thought "boon companions." This is that only name which appears to them worthy of praise, and which they vaunt more than any other; and, to acquire it, they bandy the most blundering and vile blackguardisms in the world. Often will they shove one another down-stairs; knock ribs with bludgeons and bricks; throw handfuls of dust into the eyes; and bring down people's horses upon them in ditches, or on the slope of a hill. Then, at table, soups, sauces, jellies, all do they flop in one another's face : and then they laugh ! And he who can do the most of these things accounts himself the best and most gallant courtier, and fancies he has gained great glory. And, if sometimes they invite a gentleman to these their pleasantries, and he abstains from such horse-play, forthwith they say that he makes himself too sage and grand, and is not a "boon companion." But worse remains to tell. There are some who vie and wager which of them can eat and drink the most nauseous and fetid things ; and these they hunt up so abhorrent to human senses that it is impossible to mention them without the utmost disgust.—"And what may these be ?" said Signor Lodovico Pio.—Messer Federico replied : "Let the Marquis Febus [da Ceva] tell you, as he has often seen them in France ; and perhaps the thing has happened to himself."—The Marquis Febus replied : "I have seen nothing of the sort done in France that is not also done in Italy. But, on the other hand, what is praiseworthy in Italian habits of dress, festivities, banqueting, fighting, and whatever else becomes a courtier, is all derived from the French."—"I deny not," answered Messer Federico, "that there are among the French also most noble and unassuming cavaliers : and I for my part have known many truly worthy of all praise. Yet some are to be found by no means well-bred : and, speaking generally, it appears to me that the Spaniards get on better in manner with the Italians than the French do ; since that calm gravity peculiar to the Spaniards seems to me much more conformable to us than the rapid liveliness which is to be recognized almost in every movement of the French race—which in them is not derogatory, and even has grace, because to themselves it is so natural and appropriate that it indicates no sort of affectation in them. There are indeed many Italians who would fain force themselves to imitate that manner ; and they can manage nothing else than joggling the head in speaking, and bowing sideways with a bad grace, and, when they are walking about, going so fast that the grooms cannot keep up with them. And with these modes they fancy they are good French people, and partake of their offhand ways : a thing indeed which seldom succeeds save with those who have been brought up in France, and have got into these habits from childhood upwards."

The reader will probably agree with me in thinking that Castiglione's own opinion is expressed here rather in the speech of Federico Fregoso than of the Marquis Febus ; and that the all-accomplished Italian patrician of the opening sixteenth century by no means regarded the French as the courteous nation par excellence. Elsewhere it is remarked that the French recognize nobility in arms only, and utterly despise letters and literary men ; and that presumption is a leading trait in the national character.

Castiglione does not seem to have entertained the same objection to gesturing that Francesco da Barberino did. In amusing narration or story-telling, at any rate, he approves of this accompaniment; speaking of people who 'relate and express so pleasantly something which may have happened to them, or which they have seen or heard, that with gestures and words they set it before your eyes, and make you almost lay your hand upon it.'

The banefulness of a wicked Courtier is set forth in strong terms.

'No punishment has yet been invented horrid and tremendous enough for chastising those wicked Courtiers who direct to a bad end their elegant and pleasant manners and good breeding, and by these means creep into the good graces of their sovereigns, to corrupt them, and divert them from the path of virtue, and lead them into vice: for such people may be said to infect with mortal poison, not a vessel of which one only person has to drink, but the public fountain which the whole population uses.'

The last two authors on our list, Giovanni Battista Possevini and Giovanni della Casa, will bring us to about the middle of the sixteenth century; beyond which I do not propose to pursue the subject of Italian Courtesy-Books. We are now fairly out of the middle ages, and in the full career of transition from the old to the new. Indeed, were it not that Della Casa's work, Il Galateo, is so peculiarly apposite to our purpose, I might have been disposed to leave both these writers aside as a trifle too modern in date: but, coming closer as that does to the exact definition of a Courtesy-Book than any other of the compositions which we have been considering, it must perforce find admission here,—and a few words may at the same time be spared to Possevini, who introduces us to a special department of manners. And first of Possevini.

This writer was (like Castiglione) a Mantuan, and died young—perhaps barely aged thirty. A famous man of letters, Paolo Giovio, found him to be 'a son of melancholy, and so learned, according to the title of Christ on the cross,<sup>1</sup> as to make one marvel: he is a good poet.' The book we have to deal with is of considerable size, a

<sup>1</sup> A noticeable proverbial phrase. It is new to me; but I suppose it means either 'learned in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin' (the three languages in which the inscription over the cross was written), or else perhaps 'learned in languages generally.'

Dialogue concerning Honour (Dialogo dell' Onore): it was published in 1553, after the author's death, which seems to have occurred towards 1550. Possevini is charged with having borrowed freely from another writer, who devoted himself to the denunciation of duelling, Antonio Bernardi; although indeed the publication of Bernardi's book did not take place till some years after the posthumous work of Possevini was in print. The special subject of the latter, as we have said, is honour—the quality and laws of honour, with a leading though not exclusive reference to the duelling system. Many other Italian writers of this period discussed that latter question, some upholding and some reprobating the institution. Possevini is certainly not one of its adversaries, but debates many of the ancillary points with the particularity of a casuist. The few items which I shall extract are cited more as curiosities than as fairly representing the substance of the book.

A man of letters affronted by a military man is not—so Possevini lays it down—bound to call him out, for the duel is not his vocation. If he is depreciated in his literary character, it is in writing that he should respond: if he is otherwise damnified, let him appeal to the magistrate. But this latter course is not permitted to a soldier: fighting is his business, and he must have recourse to the sword. The maxim that, in duel, one is bound either to slay one's adversary, or take him prisoner, is barbarous: it should suffice to make him recant or apologize, or to wound him, or to reduce him to surrender and humiliation.

A man who marries a professional courtesan lowers himself; yet not so far as that he can properly be refused as a duellist, or as a magistrate, or in other matters pertaining to honour. A husband who connives at his own dishonour, either by positive intention or by stupidity exceeding a certain limit, should be refused as above; not so a betrayed husband who has taken any ordinary precautions. The husband who detects his wife in adultery, without resenting it, is a dishonoured man: yet to kill her is beyond the mark,—to divorce her, contrary to canon law. He should obtain a legal abrogation of the wife's dowry, or else, as a milder course, send her back to her own people, and have no sort of knowledge of her thenceforth.

Monsignor Giovanni della Casa, created Archbishop of Benevento in 1544, was born of noble Florentine parentage on the 28th of June 1503, and died on the 14th of November 1556. He ranks as one of the best Latin and Italian poets of his century; but some of his poems are noted for licentiousness, and are even reputed to have damaged his ecclesiastical career, and lost him a Cardinal's hat. The works thus impugned appear all to belong to his youth. He had already obtained some church-preferment, and was settled in Rome, by the year 1538. On the election of Pope Julius III., in 1550, Della Casa lived privately in the city or territory of Venice, in great state, and distinguished for courteous and charitable munificence. Paul IV., who succeeded to the papacy in 1555, recalled him to Rome, and created him Secretary of State.

The Galateo (written, I presume, somewhere about 1550) has always been a very famous book in Italy; and of that sort of fame which includes great general as well as literary acceptance. It is a model of strong sententious Tuscan; approaching the pedantic, yet racily idiomatic at the same time. The title in full runs Galateo, or concerning Manners; wherein, in the Character of an Elderly Man [Vecchio Idiota] instructing a Youth, are set forth the things which ought to be observed and avoided in ordinary intercourse. The paragraphs are numbered, and amount to 180.<sup>1</sup> The name Galateo is

<sup>1</sup> That most capital and characteristic book, the Autobiography of the tragedian Alfieri, contains a reference to the Galateo, which, longish as it is, I am tempted to extract. 'My worthy Paciaudi was wont to advise me not to neglect, amid my laborious readings, works in prose, which he learnedly termed the nurse of poetry. As regards this, I remember that one day he brought me the Galateo of Della Casa; recommending me to ponder it well with respect to the turn of speech, which assuredly is pure Tuscan, and the reverse of all Frenchifying. I, who in boyhood had (as we all have) read it loosely, understood it little, and relished it not at all, felt almost offended at this schoolboyish and pedantic advice. Full of venom against the said Galateo, I opened it. And, at the sight of that first Conciossiacosachè, to which is trailed-on that long sentence so pompous and so wanting in pith, such an impulse of rage seized me that, hurling the book out of window, I cried like a maniac: "Surely a hard and disgusting necessity, that, in order to write tragedies at the age of twenty-seven, I must swallow down again this childish chatter, and relax my brain with such pedantries!" He smiled at my uneducated poetic furor; and prophesied that I would yet read the Galateo, and that more than once. And so it turned out; but several years afterwards, when I had thoroughly hardened my neck and shoulders to bear the grammatical yoke. And I read not only the Galateo, but almost all our prose writers of the fourteenth century, and annotated them too: with what profit I cannot say. But true it is that, were any one to give them a good reading as regards their turn of phrase, and to manage availing himself with judgment and skill of their array, rejecting the cast clothes of their ideas, he might perhaps afterwards, in his writings as well philosophic as poetic or historic, or of any other class, give a richness, brevity, propriety, and force of given to the book in consequence of a little anecdote which it introduces, apparently from real life. There was once a Bishop of Verona named Giovanni Matteo Giberti, noted for liberality. He entertained at his house a certain Count Ricciardo—a highly accomplished nobleman, but addicted (proh pudor!) to eating his victuals with ‘an uncouth action of lips and mouth, masticating at table with a novel noise very displeasing to hear.’ The Bishop therefore deemed it the kindest thing he could do to have the Count escorted on his homeward way by a remarkably discreet, well-bred, and experienced gentleman of the episcopal household, named Galateo, who wound up a handsome compliment at parting with a plain exposition of the guest’s peccadillo. His own misdoing was news to the Count: but he took the information altogether in good part, and seriously promised amendment.

Let us now dip into the Galateo for a few axioms; first on dining, and afterwards on other points of manners.

You must not smell at the wine-cup or the platter of any one, not even at your own; nor hand the wine which you have tasted to another, unless your very intimate friend; still less offer him any fruit at which you have bitten. Some monsters thrust their snouts, like pigs, into their broth, and never raise their eyes or hands from the victuals, and gorge rather than eat with swollen cheeks, as if they were blowing at a trumpet or a fire; and, soiling their arms almost to the elbows, make a fearful mess of their napkins.<sup>1</sup> And these same napkins they will use to wipe off perspiration, and even to blow their noses. You must not so soil your fingers as to make the napkin nasty in wiping them: neither clean them upon the bread which you are to eat: [we should hope not]. In company, and most especially at table, you should not bully nor beat any servants; colour, to his style, which I have not as yet seen fully gracing any Italian writer.’ A word or two may be spared to the formidable-looking vocable Conciossiacosachè which so excited Alfieri’s bile. It might be translated literally as ‘Herewith-be-something-that;’ and corresponds in practice to the English ‘Forasmuch as’—or more briefly ‘since,’ or ‘as.’ The Italian word poichè serves all the same uses, save that of longwindedness. But Conciossiacosachè itself is not lengthy enough for some Italian lips: and I believe that even the phrase into which it has sometimes been prolonged—‘Con ciò sia cosa fosse massimamente che’—has been used for other than burlesquing purposes.

<sup>1</sup> The comparison whereby our Archbishop illustrates the condition of the napkins must perfume our page only in its native Italian—‘Che le pezze degli agiamenti sono più nette.’

nor must you express anger, whatever may occur to excite it; nor talk of any distressful matters—wounds, illnesses, deaths, or pestilence. If any one falls into this mistake, the conversation should be dexterously changed: ‘although, as I once heard said by a worthy man our neighbour, people often would be as much eased by crying as by laughing. And he affirmed that with this motive had the mournful fictions termed tragedies been first invented: so that, being set forth in theatres, as was then the practice, they might bring tears to the eyes of those who had need of this, and thus they, weeping, might be cured of their discomfort. But, be this as it may, for us it is not befitting to sadden the minds of those with whom we converse, especially on occasions when people have met for refreshment and recreation, and not to cry: and, if any one languishes with a longing to weep, right easy will it be to relieve him with strong mustard, or to set him somewhere over the smoke.’ You should not scratch yourself at table, nor spit; or, if spit you must, do it in a seemly way. Some nations have been so self-controlling as not to spit at all.<sup>1</sup> ‘We must also beware of eating so greedily that hence comes hiccupping or other disagreeable act; as he does who hurries so that he has to puff and blow, to the annoyance of the whole company.’ Rub not your teeth with the napkin—still less with your fingers: nor rinse out your mouth, nor spit forth wine. ‘Nor, on rising from table, is it a nice habit to carry your toothpick<sup>2</sup> in your mouth, like a bird which is in nest-building,—or behind the ear, like a barber.’ You must not hang the toothpick round your neck: it shows that you are ‘overmuch prepared and provided for the service of the gullet,’ and you might as well hang your spoon in the same way. Neither must you loll on the table; nor by gesture or sound symbolize your great relish of viands or wine—a habit fit only for tavern-keepers and toppers. Also you should not put people out of countenance by pressing them to eat or drink.

‘To present to another something from the plate before oneself does not seem to me well, unless he who presents is of much the higher grade, so that the recipient is thereby honoured. For, among equals in condition, it looks as if he who offers the gift were setting himself up somehow as the superior: and sometimes that which a man gives is not to the taste of him it is given to. Besides, it implies that the dinner has no abundance of dishes, or is not well distributed, when one has too much, and another too little: and the master of the house might take it as an affront. However, in this one should do as others do, and not as it might be best to do in the abstract: and in such fashions it is better to err along with others than to be alone in well-doing. But, whatever may be the best course in this, you must not refuse what is offered you; for it would seem as if you slighted or reproved the donor.'

<sup>1</sup> This is affirmed by Xenophon of the Persians: he says in the Cyropædia that, both of old and in his own time, they did without either spitting or blowing the nose—a proof of temperance, and of energetic exercise which carried off the moisture of the body.

<sup>2</sup> Stecco. ‘Toothpick’ is the only appropriate technical sense for stecco given in the dictionaries; and I suppose it is correct here, although Della Casa’s very next sentence, denouncing the carrying of this implement round the neck, designates it by the word stuzzicadenti, and it seems odd that the two terms should be thus juxta-posed or opposed. If stecco does not in this passage really mean ‘toothpick,’ I should infer that it indicates some skewer-like object, used possibly as a fork—i. e. to secure the viands on the plate, while they are severed with a spoon, and by that conveyed to the mouth (see pp. 21 and 34 as to the use of spoon instead of fork in Bonvicino’s time). This would in fact be a sort of chop-stick. Such an inference is quite compatible with the general sense of the word stecco—any stake or splint of wood.

For one man to pledge another in the wine-cup is not an Italian usage, nor yet rightly nationalized, and should be avoided. Decline such an invitation; or confess yourself the worse drinker, and give but one sip to your wine. 'Thank God, among the many pests which have come to us from beyond the mountains, this vilest one has not yet reached us, of regarding drunkenness as not merely a laughing-matter, but even a merit.' The only time when you should wash hands in company is before going to table: you should do it then even though your hands be quite clean, 'so that he who dips with you into the same platter may know that for certain.'

Well-bred servitors, serving at table, must on no account scratch their heads or any other part of the body, nor thrust their hands anywhere under their clothes out of sight, but keep them 'visible and beyond all suspicion,' and scrupulously clean. Those who hand about plates or cups must abstain from spitting or coughing, and most especially from sneezing. If a pear or bread has been set to toast, the attendant must not blow off any ash-dust, but jog or otherwise nick it off. He must not offer his pocket-handkerchief to any one, though it be clean from the wash; for the person to whom it is offered has no assurance of that fact, and may find it distasteful. The usher must not take it upon himself to invite strangers, or to retain them to dine with his lord: if he does so, no one who knows his place will act on the invitation.

Scraping the teeth together, whistling, screaming, grinding stones, and rubbing iron, are grievous noises: and a man who has a bad voice should eschew singing, especially a solo. Coughing and sneezing must not be done loud. 'And there is also to be found such a person as, in yawning, will howl and bray like an ass; and another who, with his mouth still agape, will go on with his talk, and emits that voice, or rather that noise, which a mute produces when he tries to speak.' Indeed, much yawning should be altogether avoided: it shows that your company does not amuse you, and that you are in a vacant mood. 'And thus, when a man yawns among others who are idle and unoccupied, all they, as you may often have observed, yawn forthwith in response; as if the man had recalled to their memory the thing which they would have done before, if only they had recollected it.' Other acts discourteous to the company you are in are—to fall asleep; to pace about the room, while others are seated in conversation; to take a letter out of your pouch, and read it; to set about paring your nails; or to hum between your teeth, play the devil's tattoo, or swing your legs. Also you must not nudge a man with your elbow in talking to him. Let us have no showing of tongue, nor overmuch stroking of beard, nor rubbing-together of hands, nor heaving of long-drawn sighs, nor shaking oneself up with a start, nor stretching, and singing-out of 'Dear me!'

Having used your pocket-handkerchief, don't open it out to inspect it.

'They are in the wrong whose mouths are always full of their babies, and their wife, and their nurse. "My little boy yesterday made me laugh so—only hear." "You never saw a sweeter child than my Momus." "My wife is so-and-so." "Said Cecchina:<sup>1</sup> and could you ever believe it of such a scatterbrain?" There is no man so unoccupied that he can either reply or attend to such nonsense: and the speaker becomes a nuisance to everybody.'

In walking, you should not indulge in too much action, as by sawing with your arms; nor should you stare other passers-by in the face, as if there were some marvel there.

'Now what shall I say of those who issue from the desk into company with a pen behind the ear? or those who hold a handkerchief in the mouth? or who lay one leg along the table? or who spit on their fingers?'

Some people offend by affected humility, which is indeed a practical lying. 'With these the company has a bad bargain whenever they come to a door; for they will for no consideration in the world pass on first, but they step across, and return back,—and so fence and resist with hands and arms that at every third step it becomes necessary to battle with them, and this destroys all peace and comfort, and sometimes the business which is in hand.'

This last caveat leads on the author to a passage of importance regarding ceremoniousness in general; from which we learn that that extreme of etiquette was still almost an innovation in Italy in the middle of the sixteenth century, and contrary to the national bias. This may surprise some readers; for certainly the courteous Italian of the later period, for all his characteristic 'naturalness,' has not been wanting in ceremony, and the elaboration of politeness of phrase in his writing is something observable—at least to Englishmen, the least ceremonious nation, I suppose, under heaven (and that is by no means a term of disparagement). I subjoin the passage from Della Casa, not a little condensed; followed by another, still more abridged, concerning the essence and right of elegant manners.

<sup>1</sup> Cecchina is a double diminutive of Francesca; corresponding to 'Fannikin' or 'Fau.'

‘And therefore ceremonies (which we name, as you hear, by a foreign word, as not having one of our own—which shows that our ancestors knew them not, so that they could not give them any name) —ceremonies, I say, differ little, to my thinking, from lies and dreams, on account of their emptiness. As a worthy man has more than once shown me, those solemnities which the clergy use in relation to altars and the divine offices, and towards God and sacred things, are properly called “ceremonies.” But, as soon as men began to reverence one the other with artificial fashions beyond what is fitting, and to call each other “master” and “lord,” bowing and cringeing and bending in sign of reverence, and uncovering, and naming one another by far-sought titles, and kissing hands, as if theirs were sacred like those of priests,—somebody, as this new and silly usage had as yet no name, termed it “ceremoniousness”: I think, by way of ridicule. Which usage, beyond a doubt, is not native to us but foreign and barbarous, and imported, whencesoever it be, only of late into Italy,—which, unhappy, abased, and spiritless in her doings and influence, has grown and gloried only in vain words and superfluous titles. Ceremonies, then,—if we refer to the intention of those who practise them—are a vain indication of honour and reverence towards the person to whom they are addressed, set forth in words and shows, and concerned with titles and proffers. I say “vain” in so far as we honour in seeming those whom we hold in no reverence, and do sometimes despise. And yet, that we may not depart from the customs of others, we term them “Illustrissimo Signor” so-and-so, and “Eccellentissimo Signor” such-a-one: and in like wise we sometimes profess ourselves “most devoted servants” to some one whom we would rather dis-serve than serve. This usage, however, it is not for us individually to change—nay, we are compelled (as it is not our own fault, but that of the time) to second it; but this has to be done with discretion. Wherefore it is to be considered that ceremonies are practised either for profit, or for vanity, or by obligation. And every lie which is uttered for our own profit is a fraud and sin and a dishonest thing (as indeed one cannot in any sort of case lie with honour): and this sin do flatterers commit. And, if ceremonies are, as we said, lies and false flatteries, whenever we practise them with a view to gain we act like false and bad men: wherefore, with that view, no ceremony ought to be practised. Those which are practised by obligation must in no wise be omitted; for he who omits them is not only disliked but injurious. And thus he who addresses a single person as “You” (if it is not a person of the very lowest condition)

does him no favour: nay, were he to say "Thou," he would derogate from his due, and act insultingly and injuriously, naming him by the word which is usually reserved for poltroons and clodhoppers. And these I call "ceremonies of obligation": since they do not proceed from our own will, nor freely of our own choice, but are imposed upon us by the law—that is, by common usage. And he who is wont to be termed "Signore" by others, and himself in like manner to address others as "Signore," assumes that you contemn him or speak affrontingly when you call him simply by his name, or speak to him as "Messere," or blurt out a "You."<sup>1</sup> However, in these ceremonies of obligation, certain points should be observed, so that one may not seem either vain or haughty. And first, one should have regard to the country one lives in; for every usage is not apposite in every country. And perhaps that which is adopted by the Neapolitans, whose city abounds in men of great lineage, and in barons of lofty station, would not suit the Lucchese or Florentines, who for the most part are merchants and simply gentlemen, having among them neither princes nor marquises nor any baron. Besides this, regard must be paid to the occasion, to the age and condition of the person towards whom we practise ceremony, and to our own; and, with busy people, one should cut them off altogether, or at any rate shorten them as much as one can, and rather imply than express them: which the courtiers in Rome are very expert in. Neither are men of great virtue and excellence in the habit of practising many; nor do they like or seek that many be practised towards them, not being minded to waste much thought over futilities. Nor yet should artisans and persons of low condition care to practise very elaborate ceremonies towards great men and lords: for these rather than otherwise dislike such demonstrations at their hands—for their way is to seek and expect obedience more than civilities. And thus the servant who proffers his service to his master makes a mistake: for the master takes it amiss, and esteems that the servant wants to call in question his mastership,—as if his right were not to dictate and command. If you show a little suitable abundance of politeness to those who are your inferiors, you will be called courteous. And, if you do the same to your superiors, you will be termed well-bred and agreeable. But he who should in this matter be excessive and profuse would be blamed as vain and frivolous; and perhaps even worse would befall him, for he might be held evil and sycophantic. And this is the third kind of ceremonies, which does indeed proceed from our will, and not from usage. Let us then recollect that ceremonies (as I said from the first) were naturally not necessary,—on the contrary, people got on perfectly well without them : as our own nation, not long ago, did almost wholly. But the illnesses of others have infected us also with this and many other infirmities. For which reasons, when we have submitted to usage, all the residue in this matter that is superfluous is a kind of licit lying : or rather, from that point onwards, not licit but forbidden—and therefore a displeasing and tedious thing to noble souls, which will not live on baubles and appearances. Vain and elaborate and superabundant ceremonies are flatteries but little covert, and indeed open and recognized by all. But there is another sort of ceremonious persons who make an art and trade of this, and keep book and document of it. To such a class of persons, a giggle ; and to such another, a smile. And the more noble shall sit upon the chair, and the less noble upon the settle. Which ceremonies I think were imported from Spain into Italy. But our country has given them a poor reception, and they have taken little root here ; for this so punctilious distinction of nobility is a vexation to us :<sup>1</sup> and therefore no one ought to set himself up as judge, to decide who is more noble, and who less so.—To speak generally, ceremoniousness annoys most men ; because by it people are prevented from living in their own way—that is, prevented from liberty, which every man desires before all things else.’

<sup>1</sup> The English reader may fancy that this passage conflicts with that which immediately precedes: but such is not the case. In the earlier passage, the use of You was recommended as more civil than Thou: in the later passage, the use of Vossignoria (or other the like impersonal term, where appropriate) as more respectful than You.

‘ Agreeable manners are those which afford delight, or at least do not produce any vexation, to the feelings, appetite, or imagination, of those with whom we have to do. A man should not be content with doing that which is right, but should also study to do it with grace. And grace [leggiadria] is as it were a light which shines from the fittingness of things that are well composed and well assorted the one with the other, and all of them together ; without which measure even the good is not beautiful, and beauty is not pleasurable. Therefore well-bred persons should have regard to this measure, both in walking, standing, and sitting, in gesture, demeanour, and clothing, in words and in silence, and in rest and in action.’

Besides the Galateo, Monsignor della Casa has left another and shorter Tractate on Amicable Intercourse between Superiors and Inferiors (Trattato degli Uffici Comuni tra gli Amici Superiori e Inferiori). This deals not so much with the relation between those who are rich and those who are poor in the gifts of fortune, taken simply on that footing, as with the connection between master and servant, patron and client, magnate and dependent. The tone is grave and humane, with an adequate share of worldly wisdom interspersed. The opening is interesting and suggestive; and shows that the great 'Servant Controversy,' of which the pages of English daily newspapers are now almost annually conscious in the dull season, was by no means unknown to Italy in the sixteenth century:—

<sup>1</sup> This is, I think, still a national trait among Italians, and a most creditable one : the endless grades and sub-grades, shades and demi-shades, of good society, as maintained in England (with an instinct comparable to the marvellous power of a bat to wing its dark way amid any number of impediments, and to be impeded by none of them), are unintelligible to ordinary Italians—or, where intelligible, detestable. Long may they remain so !

'I apprehend that the ancients were free from a great and continual trouble; having their households composed, not of free men, as is our usage, but of slaves, of whose labour they availed themselves, both for the comforts of life, and to maintain their repute, and for the other demands of society. For, as the nature of man is noble, copious, and erect, and far more apt to commanding than obeying, a hard and odious task do those undertake who assume to exercise masterdom over it, while still bold and of undiminished strength, as is done now-a-days. To the ancients, in my judgment, it was no difficult or troublesome thing to command those who were already quelled and almost domesticated—people whom either chains, or long fatigues, or a soul servile from very childhood, had bereaved of pride and force. We on the contrary have to do with souls robust, spirited, and almost unbending; which, through the vigour of their nature, refuse and hate to be in subjection, and, knowing themselves free, resist their masters, or at least seek and demand (often with reason, but sometimes also without) that in commanding them some measure be observed. Whence it arises that every house is full of complaints, wranglings, and questionings. And certainly this is the fact; because we are unjust judges in our own cause,—and, as it is true that everybody unfairly prizes his own affairs higher than those of others, albeit of equal value, and consequently always persuades himself that he has given more than he has received, the thing cannot go on pari passu. Hence comes the wearisome complaint of the one, "I have worn myself out in your house;" and the rebuke of the other, "I have maintained and fed you, and treated you well."'

I can afford only one more extract from this treatise; which indeed handles its general subject-matter more on the ground of fairness, good-feeling, and expedient compromise of conflicting claims, than as a question of courtesy—though neither is that left out of view.

'In giving orders and assigning duties which have to be fulfilled, let regard be paid to the condition of the individuals; so that, if anything uncleanly is to be done, that be allotted to the lowest, and it come not to pass (as some perverse-natured people will have it) that noblemen<sup>1</sup> should sweep the house, and carry slops out of the chambers. Let not things of much labour be committed to the weak, nor the degrading to the well-mannered, nor the frivolous and sportful to the aged. Moreover let the masters be heedful not to impose upon any one anything of uncommon difficulty or labour or painstaking, unless of necessity or for some great cause; for the laws of humanity command us not to make a call upon a man's diligence and solicitude beyond what is reasonable, or as if in levity—especially if it exceeds the ordinary bounds.'

With this I shut up Della Casa's volume, and take final leave of my reader—trusting that, after perusing, skimming, or skipping, so much matter concerning Courtesy, he will part from me on the terms of (at lowest) a 'courteous reader,' in more than the merely conventional sense.

<sup>1</sup> Nobili. I presume this is to be understood literally; the household in which noblemen could be thus employed being of course one of exalted position.

Handwritten text, possibly a signature or date, located in the upper right quadrant of the page.

Small handwritten text or mark located in the middle right area of the page.

University of Toronto
Library

---

DO NOT REMOVE
THE
CARD
FROM THIS POCKET

---

Acme Library Card Pocket
LOWE-MARTIN CO. LIMITED

